A kings in old time, he might soone have received a great foile and overthrow. But king Perseus as he coasted & ranged with his cavallerie upon the strond nere Dium (albeit for the space of twelve miles wel-nere, he heard the cries and shouts of them that were in fight); neither reenforced the companies by sending fresh souldiours in place of the wearied, nor shewed himselfe in person at the battaile: (which had bene a thing, I assure you, of most importance) whereas the Romane Generall being above threecore yeeres of age, corpulent besides and unweldie, performed himselfe right lustily all military services of a valiant warrior; persisting in that to the very end most bravely, which he had begun and enterprised so boldly; and having left Popilius for to guard the hill top, passed over places that had no tracts at all to direct them, by sending out before, certain men of purpose to scoure and prepare to make passage. As for Attalus and Misagenes, hee commaunded them both, with the auxiliarie souldiours of their owne nation to guard them that opened the way before. Then hee putting before him in the march the horsemen with the baggage, came behind with the legionarie footmen in the rereguard. No tongue is able to expresse what a toile and painfull labour they found in going down the hill, the sumpter horses with their packes and carriages tumbled so downe one with another: in so much as when they had scarcely gone foure miles forward, they wished in their hearts nothing more, than to returne the way they came, if it had bene possible. The elephants troubled the march as much in manner as the enemies could: for when they were come to a place where they could see no way, downe they cast their riders and governours, laying them along on the earth, and with the horrible braying that they made, affrighted their horses especially, untill such time as a devise was found for their passage. They began first to make the head or entrance of a bridge at the very brow and edge of a steepe downefall: this done, in the lower ground beneath, they set fast in the earth good strong and long posts of wood, two by two distant one from the other traverse-wise little more than the largenes of one of those beasts. Upon which rested fast joined with tennon & mortise certain rafters like wal-plats 30 foot in length, and those being couched with planks crosse over in foirne of a bridge, had earth and mould cast thereupon. A little way off beneath it, such another bridge was made; and so a third likewise, and many more consequently according as the craggie ground was broken and uneven. Now the Elephant from the firme ground entred upon the first bridge aforesaid; but before he was gone as farre as to the foot and end thereof, the posts abovenamed were cut a two underneath; to the end that the bridge might fall, and in the easie reeling thereof the beast also gently slide, as it were, and be carried therewith as farre as the head of a second bridge. Thus some of them glid and kept themselves standing upright on their feet, others rested upon their buttockes. Againe, when they were come to the plaine and levell floure of another such like bridge, by the fall of it in manner aforesaid they were driven unto a third bridge beneath it, untill such time as they were come to a more plaine and even valley. In this order the Romanes could rid little more than seven miles that day. And the least part thereof went they upright on their feet, but were faine most what to tumble and roll over and over with their armour and fardels about them: and thus they gat forward in all kind of paine and trouble; in such sort, that he who induced them to this journey and conducted them therein, could not denie but the whole armie (with a small power coming against them) might utterly have ben defeated. By night they arrived at a pretie plaine; but the place beeing so enclosed on all sides, they had no space and rounge to view round about, whether it were dangerous or no. At length after much adoe and beyond their expectation, they met with a firme peece of ground, whereas they might take sure footing; and there they were forced the morrow following to attend in the hollow valley the coming of Popilius and the companies left with him; who also were exceedingly fore vexed and plagued with the roughnesse of the way, albeit the enemies troubled and affrighted them no whit at all. The third day, after they had joined their forces together, they tooke their way through a passe, which the inhabitants call Callipeuce. The fourth day they passed over a place that had no more meanes to direct them, than the other before; but by use and experience they were growne more skilfull: and better hope they had, for that the enemye in no place appeared, but approached neere to the sea. When they were come once downe into the plaines between Haractus and Lebethrus, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hills) pitched their tents and tooke up the valley, and a good part of the plaine wherein the horsemen should quarrel. As the king was bathing himselfe, it is said that word came, How the enemies were neere at hand: at which newes he was so skared, that he leapt from out of his bathing thing vessel, and he had gat him out of the bame, crying aloud, That hee was vanquished without drawing sword and stroke given: neither wist hee for feare which way to turne him; taking sundrie counsels one in the necke of another, and commaunding he knew not what, sometime this and sometime that. In this perplexitie hee sent for Asclepiodorus (one of his two especiall friends) out of the place where he lay in garrison, to goe to Pella where all his money and treasure lay; and by this meanes opened all the avenues for the Romanes to make warre. Himselfe, after he had in great hast bestowed and piled up in his ships, all the gilden images at Diu, to the end that the enemye should make no prize of them, caused with all speed possible to truffle up and to remoove to Pydna; and hereby gave occasion, that the enterprise of the Consull which might have seemed rashnesse (in that he had engaged himselfe so farre, that he could not possibly retire againe without leave of the enemye) proved in the end no inconsiderate and un-advised designment. For now the Romanes had the choice of two passages through which they might escape away; the one, by Tempe into Thessalie; the other into Macedonie, by the way nere Diu: both which before were held by the kings guards. So as if a resolute and fearelesse captaine could have held out and endured but one ten daies the first apparence and shew of terror that approached, the Romanes could neither have returned into Thessalie by Tempe, nor found way for conveiance of provision and victuals to the place where they were. For Tempe is of it selfe a difficult passage, even without any force of armes to make it dangerous. And why?

besides the straight gullet five miles in length, yeelding a very narrow way for one beast to goe charged with burden; the rocks of either hand are so steepe and upright, that hardly a man is able to looke downe from them, but his eyes will dazle, his braynes turne, and his head be giddie withall. Moreover, the sound and noise, yea and the depth of the river Peneus running directly through the mids of the valley, encreaseth the feare so much the more. This place, so perillous of it owne nature, had beene holden and guarded with the kings garrisons in foure severall distant places. The one kept at the verie first entrance, necere to Conius; the second at Condyl-los, a fort imprenable; the third about Lapathus, which also they call Charax; and the fourth was placed even upon the verie avenue it selfe, about the mids of the valley, where it is at the steepest, and which may be easily defended with ten men if there were no more. In this manner (I say) the passage being stopped up by Tempe, as wel for portage of provisions thither as for returne from thence, the Romanes mult by force have retired againe up to the same mountains from whence they were descended. But as they came downe & were not discovered, so being now descried, they could not possibly have gained them againe in open view, considering that the enemyes had possessed the tops of the mountains; and no doubt, the difficultie therof besides, which they had tried already, would have cut off all hope of that adventure: so as, being waded thus far into this rash enterprise, there remained no meanes else for them, but to have passed through the mids of the enemyes at Diu, for to escape and pierce into Macedonie: an adventure no doubt;
(if the gods had not bereft the king of his right wits) most difficult and dangerous unto them.
For it being so, that from the foot of the mountaine Olympus unto the sea, there is little above a mile space betwene: the one halfe whereof, is taken up with the mouth of the river Bophyrus; which in this place spreadeth very broad and large; and another part of the plain; either the temple of Jupiter or the towne it selfe occupieth: the rest besides, being but a verie small place, might have beene enclosed and made fast against them with a little trench and rampier; besides such store there was of stone readie at hand, and of timber out of the forest, that they might either have raised a mure, or framed turrets and such like fabricks in their way. But the king (whose spirit & understanding was blinded with sodain feare) fore-seeing none of all these things, but dis-turbning every sort of their garrisons, made open passage for the current of war, & fledd himselfe to Pydna. The Consull perceiving that he had gotten great advantage and many hopes by the follic and negligence of his enemye, dispatched a carrier back toward Larissa unto Sp. Lucretius, willing him to seize those forts into his hands about Tempe, which were abandoned by the enemye: and after he had sent Popilius before in spiall to discover all the passages about Diu, and perceived that the avenues were open in all parts, hee marched forwards himselfe, and by the second gitt came to Diu; where he commaunded to encampe under the very temple, to the end, that no violent outrage should be committed in that holy place. Himselfe in proper person entred into the citie, which as it was not great, so it was garnished with faire publick buildings, beautified with a number of goodly images, and passing well fortified besides: in so much as he could

A could not well beleeve, that things of such importance were abandoned for nothing, but that there was some secrete deceit and treacherie lurking underneath. After hee had staied there one full day, to espie and see that all coasts were cleere, hee dislodged and marched on; and supposing verily that he should be provided of sufficient store of graine, hee advanced forward that verie day to the river named Mytis. The morrow after, he tooke possession of the citie Agassa, which the inhabitants willingly rendred unto him. And to win the hearts of all other Macedonians, (contenting himselfe onely with hostages) he promised to leave them their citie cleere without a garrison; and to permit them to live under their owne lawes, without payment of any tribute.
Being marched onward one daies journey from thence, hee pitched downe his tents fast upon the river Ascordus: but feeling and finding still (the farther he went from Thessalie) more and more want of all things, hee retired backe to Diu; and then all men saw plainly and made no doubt, to what streights hee should have beene driven, in case he had beene cleane shut out from Thessalie, considering that it was not safe for him to remove far from thence where he was.
... Perseus having rallied all his forces, and assembled his captaines into one place, checked and raised up the captaines of the garrisons and guards aforesaid over the passages: but above all he rebuked Asclepiodorus and Hippius most, saying; that those two had betrayed unto the Romanes the port-gates into Macedonie: whereas indeed no man was more justly to be blamed for that, than his owne selfe.

The Consull after he had discovered a farre off from sea a fleet of Romane ships, conceived good hope that vessels were coming charged with provision of victuals (for now in his campe the dearth was great, and brought they were alreadie to extreame want and scarcitie.) But hee was advised by them who were entred within the harbour, that the hulkes and ships of burden were left behind at Magnesia. Whereupon, being in great doubt what to doe (so hard went all things with him at the present, that hee had worke ynough to wrestle with that onely difficultie, without being farther encombred with any empeachment from the enemye) behold in happie time, messengers were brought unto him from Sp. Lucretius, importing thus much; That hee was master of all the forts and holds planted upon Tempe and round about Phila, where he had found great plentie of corne and other necessaries. The Consull right joious for these good tidings, set his armie on foot from Diu to Phila, as well to strengthen the garrison there, as also to deale come among his souldiours; which would have requiied a long time ere it could have beene brought over to them at Diu.

D That departure and journey of his was nothing wel spoken off: for some gave out, that the Generall reculed from the enemye for very feare; because that if he had staied there still, he should have beene forced to a battaile: others said, that he had no skill in warre, neither in those occur-rents, which fortunes wheele turning about altereth every day, offering one new thing or other; who when occasions and opportunities were presented unto him, let the same slip out of his hands, which soone after might not possibly be recovered againe. And verily, he had not so soon quitted possession of Diu, but he started and awakened the enemye, and put in his head now at length to regain those matters, which had ben lost before through his own default. For hearing that the Consull was departed, he returned immediately to Diu; where he repaired whatsoever E had beene demolished and ruinate by the Romanes: the battlements of the wals which were cast downe he set up againe in the right place; and in all parts fortified the mure and bulwarks of the citie. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this side Enipeus, intending that the river it selfe (which is verie hard to be passed over) should serve him in stead of a rampier and trench of defence. This river runneth out of the vale from under the mountaine Olympus, and in sommer season is small and shallow, but in winter it riseth high and spreadeth broad by reason of raine:
running also with a forcible current and streame, it tummounteth great rockes, and among those stonie crags and shelves maketh many whirlpits: by occasion likewise, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the sea, store of earth, there are many gulfes of exceeding depth: and by reason that it hath eaten a hollow channell in the mids, the banks of ech side are verie high and steep upright. Perseus, supposing that by the means of this river, the enemyes were debarred from all F passage, purposed in his mind to hold off, and drive out the rest of the sommer in that sort.

But the Consull in the meane while sent Popilius from Phila into Heraclaea with two thousand armed fighting men. This Heraclaea standeth about five miles from Phila, situate in the mid-way betwene Diu and Tempe, upon a rocke that commaundeth this river. Popilius, before that he caused his men to approach the walls, sent certaine persons of purpose to perswade the magistrats and cheefe of the citie, to make prooffe of the faithfull protection and clemencie of the people of Rome, rather than to trie their rigor and violence. But this motive and aduise availed not, because they might discerne the fires from out of the kings campe neere to Enipeus: whereupon, both from the land and sea-side (for the fleet also being thither arrived ankered neere the shore) as well by force of armes as by fabrickes and engines of batterie, they began to assaile the towne. Moreover, certaine young and lustie Romane souldiours (making use now in warre of the exercise which they had practised in the games Circeanes) gat over the wal where it was lowest. The manner was in those daies (before this wastfull prodigallitie came up of filling the whole cirque or shew-place with beasts fet out of all countries) to devise & seek sundrie sorts of publick sights & spectacles to behold; and not in running one course with the chariot, & another on horsebacke, and so an end, to employ in both races hardly the space of one full houre. Among other feats of activitie exhibited, the maisters and wardens of those exercises and games, brought into the race commonly 60 (and otherwhiles more) lustie young men in armes well appointed. Their training in part represented a shew and apparance of two armies encountering and charging one another, in part also the use and practise of a more gentle and elegant exercise than militarie profession, and coming neerer to the handling and managing of weapons. after the order of sword-fencers. These young gallants, after they had performed other ordinarie runnings and courses, put themselves in a four-square squadron, with their bucklers or targuets close cotted and joined together over their heads, in this manner: They that were formost in the front stood bolt upright; the second ranke stooped somewhat lower under the other; the third course more than they, and so the fourth, untill the hindmost kneeled on their knees: and by this means they resembled a pavoisade rising up higher and higher, like the pent-house or rouse of edifices. This done, two men well armed, fetching their run sitie foot or thereabout backward from thence, and seeming to desie and challenge one another, mounted the foresaid pavoisade, and ran from the nether end up to the top upon those targuets so jointly united & set close and thick together: and one while they set their countenance as though they would defend the sides and edges thereof, otherwhiles in the mids they seemed to performe their devoir and maintaine combat one with another, as upon firme and steadie ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavoisade framed and brought close to one part of the wall: and when armed men were mounted upon it, they that stood upon the verie ridge thereof, were as high full as the defendants which kept the wall: who being once beaten backe and turned downe, two ensignes of souldiours gat over into the citie. The onely difference betwene this pavoisade and the other above described was this, that they onely who stood in the front before: and in the flanks, bare not their targuets aloft above their own heads, because their sides and bodies should not be naked and exposed to hurt, but carried them before, after the usuall manner of fighting men in a battaile. By which meanes, neither the arrowes and darts discharged from the wall hurt them affront, nor the shot that light upon their targuet-fence tooke any hold; but glaunced and glid downeward from the top without doing any harme, like to raine water that shooteth from the ridge of an house, and runneth downe the eaves. The Consul likewise, now that Heraclea was woen, advanced forward with his armie thither, pretending as though hee marched toward Diu, and as if after hee had chased and driven the king from thence, hee minded to passe forward also into Pieria. But preparing now against winter, he commaunded to make the waies fit and handsome, for the carriage of provision out of Thessalie, and to chuse out commodious places for garners: also to build certaine houses, wherein they that brought the provision, might lie in couert and lodge commodiously. Perseus in the end having taken heart againe and gathered his wits together, upon that late fright which had amazed his spirits, wished then with all his heart, that his commaundements had not been obaied, at what time as in a fearefull fit hee gave expresse charge to cast the treasure into the sea at Pella, and to set on fire the arcenall at Thessalonica. Andronicus being sent for the same purpose to Thessalonica made no hast to execute his will, but trised out the time for the nonce, leaving the king some respite to repent, as it fell out indeed. Nicias was not so provident and well advised at Pella, in throwing away some part of the money which hether found: howbeit hee thought his fault such, as might in some sort be remedied and amended, for that, all the said treasure in maner was recovered by the means of certain dyvers that fished for it under water, and fetcht it up from the bottome of the sea. But the king himselfe was so ashamed of

A of this foolish feare, that in a melancholic hee commaunded those poore dyvers to bee secretly murdered, yea, and afterwards Andronicus and Nicias also; to the end, that no person should remaine alive that was privie to that forthitt commaundement of his.

Amids these affaires, C. Martius having losed to sea from Heraclea, and with his fleet sailed to Thessalonica, landed his armed souldiours in divers places of the shore, and made wast in the territorie al about: and when they made sallies out of the citie & charged upon him, after some fortunar skirmishes he chased them backe and beat them within the walls. So as at length he terrified the towne it selfe: but not onely they, who raunging up and downe here and there, unadvisedly approached the walls, were wounded with shot discharged out of instruments of all sorts, planted upon the walls; but those also who were in the ships, were hurt with stones; weighed and levelled from engines a farre off. Upon which occasion hee commaunded his souldiours to retire a shipboure, and leaving the siege of Thessalonica, they passed from thence to Aenia, a cittie fiftene miles off, situate in a fertile soile just over against Pydna. When they had spoiled the territorie lying to that citie, they coasted along the shore, and arrived at Antigonion. Where, being set a land, first they spoiled the countrey in every quarter, and brought good store of prizes to their ships: but afterwards, as they stragled out of order and disbanded, the Macedonians, as well footmen as horse, ran upon them, and chased them as they fled apace to the sea-side; in which rout they slew upon a five hundred, and tooke as many prisoners. And nothing els provoked the courages of the Romanes (in regard as well of utter despaire otherwise to save themselves, as of the indignitie it selfe, so to hazard their honour) but onely the extreame necessitie wherein they stood, having no meanes to recover their ships in safetie. Whereupon they turned head, and renewed the fight upon the very sea strand. They also who were a shipboure, succoured and helped them. In which conflict, two hundred Macedonians lost their lives, and as many were taken prisoners. From Antigonion the fleet weighed anker, and made head toward the territorie of Pallene, where the souldiours were set on shore to spoile the countrey. This territorie appertained to the confines of the Cassandreans, the most fruitfull tract of all those parts which they had coasted and sailed by. There, king Eumenes being departed from Elea with twentie warre ships met with them, and likewise five other covert ships were sent from king Prusias. The Pretour seeing this good encrease and addition of his forces, took a better heart unto him, even to besiege Cassandrea. This citie was built by king Cassander, in the very straight and gullet which joineth the territorie of Pallene with the rest of the Macedonian countrey, enclosed of the one side with the Toronian sea, and on the other with the Macedonian: For there lyeth out a banke or shelve like a tongue into the sea, upon which the citie standeth, and beareth into the deepe, no lesse in compasse and quantitie than is the mountaine Athos. It butteth full against Magnesia, with two promontories of unequall bignes; of which the greater is called Posideum; the lesse Canastrium. This towne they began to assaile in two divers parts. The Roman (Pretor) drew his fortification to a place called Clitæ, opposing certaine strong forked stakes for to debar and shut up the way from the Macedonian sea to the Toronian. On the other side there is an Euripe or arm of the sea, from which quarter Eumenes gave the assault. The most trouble & toile that the Romans found, was in damming & filling up the trench, which Perseus had cast against them a little before. And as the Pretor enquired where the earth was bestowed which was throwne out of the trench aforesaid, because he could see no heapes thereof any where, there were shewed unto him certaine vaults and arches within, which bewraied a new wall, not built to the thicknesse of the old, but with perpend worke, laid with one course of bricke and no more. Whereupon hee resolved to pierce through the said wall, and so to make way into the citie. The which hee thought to execute and performe without beeing discovered, in case hee skaled the wall in another quarter, and by making a shout and alarme there, withdrew all the defendants of the citie to the guard of that one place. There lay in garrison at Cassandrea (besides a sufficient number of serviceable yong men of the citie) eight hundred Agrianes, and two thousand Penestians of Sclavonie, sent from thence by Pleuratus; and both these nations are hardie warriours. Whiles these defended the walls manfully, & the Romans endeavoured with all their might to mount over, the thin walls of the vaults and arches aforesaid were wrought and digged through in the turning of an hand, and gave entrance into the citie. Now if they who brake in, had ben armed (as they were but pions) the towne had been taken at that instant. But when as the souldiours heard news, that the said worke was finished, they suddainely set up a cheerefull shout for joy, being readie, some in one one place and some in another to rush into the citie. The enemies at the first wondred what the meaning should be of that suddain crie: but the captains of the garison, Pytho & Philippus Præco, being once advertised that the towne lay open, supposing that herein consisted the vantage, who could first prevent the other and give the charge, sallied forth with a strong band of Agrians and Illyrians: and whiles the Romans rallied themselves some from this place, & others from that, and were called together for to enter the citie with banner displayed, they set upon them unready as they were, and not ranged in any good order, put them to flight and chased them as farre as to the trench, where they overthrew them, and laid them one upon another by heapes. Sixe hundred or very neere were there killed: and all in manner whome they could reach betwene the wall and the trench were sore hurt. The Pretour thus overtaken in his own enterprise, was not so hastie as to project any new designes; neither sped Eumenes any better, albeit at one time he assaulted the citie both by land and sea. Whereupon they accorded both, to set good strong guards, for to impeach the passage of all garisons out of Macedonie thither; and (since a part force tooke no better effect) to assaile the walls with fabrickes and engines. As they were busie in preparation thereof, there arived ten frigors of the kings, sent from Macedonie with certaine select auxiliarie Gaules. These when they perceived their enemies ships riding at anchor, sailed in single raunge one after another, as close as possible they could to the shore in the darke night, and so entered the citie. The bruit that went of this new succour and garison, forced as well the Romanes as the king to give over the siege; so fetching a compasse about the promontorie, they arrived before Torone. And when they began to lie against it, after they perceived once that there was a valiant companie there to defend it, they abandoned their enterprise without effect, and sailed to Demetrias. Being approached thither, and seeing the walls full of armed men, they passed by and anchored at Iolcos: intending after they had spoiled the territorie, to set upon Demetrias. Meanwhile, the Consull also because he would not sit still doing nothing in the enemies countrie, sent M. Popilius with five thousand souldiours to give the assault to the citie Melibæa. Seated it is at the foot of the mountain Ossa, on that side which looketh to Thessalie, and very fitly for the purpose commandeth Demetrias. The first arrivall of the enemies put the inhabitants of the place in great affright; but after they had recovered their spirits daunted with unexpected fear, they ran in arms to the gates, & up to the walls, where they doubted and suspected any place like to give entrance; & inconspicuously cut off all hope from the enemies, that it could possibly be forced at the first assault. Whereupon they prepared to lay siege unto it, and began to make fabrickes and engines to batter the walls. Petseus, having intelligence, that in one instant both Melibæa was beleaguered by the Consull, and also that the fleet anchored before Iolcos, to the intent that from thence he might go in hand to assaile Demetrias: sent Euphranor one of his captaines, with a chosen regiment of two thousand souldiours to Melibæa; with this charge and direction, That if hee could raise the siege from Melibæa: and force the Romans to depart, he should march secretly to Demetrias, and put himselfe within the towne, before the Romanes could remooove from Iolcos and advance before the citie. The assailants of Melibæa discovering him with his forces all at once upon the higher places, quit their fabrickes and engines in fearefull hast, and set them all on fire; and thus they departed from before Melibæa. Euphranor having levied the siege from this one citie, forthwith led his armie to Demetrias. And then the citizens assured themselves, that they should be able not only to defend the citie against the siege, but also to save their territorie from wast and spoile: and so they made sallies upon the foragers dispersed loosely here and there, not without drawing blood of their enemies. Howbeit the Pretour and the king rode about the walls, and viewed the situation of the towne, if peradventure they could espie any one place which they were like to force, either with batterie of engines or force of armes. The voice went, that by the means of Cydus the Cretensian, and Antiochus governour of Demetrias, there was a treatie of peace and amitie betwene Philip and Eumenes. But howsoever it was, this is certaine, both Eumenes and the Pretour departed from Demetrias. As for Eumenes, he failed to the Consull, and testified unto him the joy that he conceived for his safe and prosperous entrance into Macedonie; and from thence returned to Pergamus into his owne realme. But Martius Figulus the Pretour, when hee had sent part of his fleet into the harbor of Sciathus there to winter, with the rest of his ships went to Orecum in Boeotia: supposing it a most commodious citie, from whence victuals and all provisions might be sent to the armies that abode either in Macedonie or Thessalie. As touching Eumenes, sundrie authors have have written diversly. If a man should goe by Valerius Antias and beleve him, hee reporteth, that neither the Pretour had any helpe from him by his navie, notwithstanding that oftentimes he had sent for him by his letters; nor tooke his leave of the Consull in good tearmes with favour, at what time as hee was to depart into Asia, as beeing highly displeased, that hee was not permitted to quarter with him in one and the same campe; in so much as he could not possibly be entreated by him, to leave behind that Cavallerie of Gaules which he had brought thither with him. As for Attalus his brother, hee remained still with the Consull (as Valerius saith) and continued sincere, fast, and faithfull unto him without any change and alteration; yea and performed right good service in all that warre.

During these warres in Macedonie, there came embassadours from beyond the Alpes to Rome, sent from a petie king of the Gaules (Balanos he had to name, but of what lineage hee was defended it is not recorded) promising aid to the Macedonian warre. Thanked they were from the Senat, & presents were sent unto them: to wit, a chaine of gold weighing two pound; certain golden cups of foure pound weight, a brave courser barbd and trapped, and an horsmans armour. After these Gaules were gone out of place, the embassadours of Pamphylia brought with them into the Senate a golden crowne, valed at 20000 Philip-peecees of gold: their request was, that they might be permitted to set up the said present and oblation in the chappell of Jup. Opt. Max. and likewise to sacrifice within the Capitoll. Their petition was graunted: & when these embassadours were desirous to renew the amitie betwene them and the Romanes, they received a gracious answer, & had of them a reward sent of two thousand Asses. Then the embassadours Colking Prusias, and anone after, others from the Rhodians had audience; who of one and the same argument discoursed diversly; for both tended to one thing, namely a treatie for reconciliation of peace betwene the Romanes and king Persius. Prusias seemed to intreat rather than to demand: protesting that he had ever to that day stood with the Romans in that war; & willingly would friend them still to the very end thereof: but since that, there came embassadours unto him from Persius, and dealt with him to make an end of the warre betwene him and the Romanes; and for that he promised them to be a mediator and intercessor for him to the Romanes; therefore his request was unto them (if they could so find in their hearts) to stint their anger, and so they should use him in any service, as one that would acknowledge himself beholden unto them for a favor; in effecting this attonement & reconciliation. In this manner (I say) spake the king his embassadours. But the Rhodians contrariwise, in a proud humor of theirs, reckoned up a beadrill of their demerits toward the people of Rome, attributing the greater part (beleeve mee) of the victory of king Antiochus to themselves: moreover they added and said, that when the Macedonians and Romanes were at peace, they began to enter into league and amitie with king Persius; which they had interrupted and discontinued against their will; not upon any desert or occasion given of his part, but onely because it pleased the Romanes to draw them into the association of the war. Three yeeres now alreadie (say they) have we felt the smart of this war & lived by the losse; by reason that the seas are shut up from us, and our Iland is decayed and distressed for need and want, having lost our tollage & customes yssuing from the seas: which we not able to endure any longer, have addressed other embassadours to Persius into Macedonie to intimate unto him, that the Rhodians will and pleasure was, that he should grow to a composition and bee at peace with the Romanes. Our selves also are sent to Rome to declare the same: and likewise to denounce, That whosoever shall impeach and hinder this course tending to pacification, the Rhodians will consider of them accordingly, and bethinke how they are to proceed against them. I am verily perswaded, that there is no man at this day, who can heare or read this, but his stomacke will rise thereat with indignation; guesse then thereby how the LL. of the Senate of Rome were affected and touched as then, at the hearing thereof. Claudius mine author saith, That there was no answer at all given unto them. Onely an arrest or decree of the Senate was read before them, importing thus much, That by order from the people of Rome, the Carians and Lycians were made free: and presently were letters dispatched to both nations to signifie so much unto them. Which when the principall person of the embassage once heard, even hee, whose big and brave words a little before, the whole Senate-houfe was hardly able to containe, fell downe flat before them in a swoone and extasie. Other Historians write, that this answer was returned, That the people of Rome at the verie beginning of this warre, knew assuredly (by intelligence given from persons of right good credite) how the Rhodians had secretly cretly complotted with Persus against the state of Rome: and if there had ben some doubt thereof before, yet the words of the embassadors erewhile delivered, made all cleere & put it past peradventure: and no mervaille, since that for the most part it falleth out, that such cautelous practises howsoever at the first they are covertly and cleanly caried, yet one time or other are bewraied and discovered. Let the Rhodians send their messengers over the world and spare not; let them make themselves judges to determine of war & peace at their pleasure: as for the Romans, they will take armes in hand, and lay them downe againe at the will and appointment of the gods in heaven. We are well holpen up now in deed, it wee must have the gods no more to be witnesses of our accords, but the Rhodians forsooth. And must the Romans (I would not else) be ruled by them, and withdraw their forces out of Macedonie? They will consider and advise themselves how to proceed against us! How shall wee doe then? What the Rhodians will see to, well may they perhaps themselves know: but the people of Rome (that is certaine) will consider indeed and resolve, after that Persus is vanquished (which they hope will not be long first) to recompence and requite every citie and state according as they have deserved in the service of this war. As shalpe as this answer was, yet they sent a reward to these embassadors, to every one of them 2000 asses; but none would they receive.

After this, were the letters read of Q. Martius the Consull, containing thus much, namely, How he had passed over the streights of the forest, and was come into Macedonie; where he had provision of victuals which the Pretour had given order for out of other places to serve for winter: and besides, had taken up of the Epirotes twentie thousand Modij of wheat and ten thousand of barley, for which corn they should make money readie at Rome to content their embassadors. Also that they must send from Rome souldiours liveries and other apparell: and need hee had besides of two hundred horse or thereabout, especially of Numidia; for that in those parts hee had no plentie of any thing. Hereupon an act was granted out of the Senat, That all these things should be done according to the tenor of the Consull his letters. So C. Sulpitius the Pretor bargained for the transporting over into Macedonie of six hundred side cassocks and thirtie thousand short coats or jackets, together with horses; for to be disposed and distributed at the discretion of the Consull: and besides paid the embassadours of the Epirotes good money for their graine. He brought also into the Senate, Onesimus the son of Pytho a noble personage of Macedonie. This man was evermore of counsel with the K. perswading him to peace; and admonished him, that like as his father Philip before him, observed an order even to the time of death to read over twise a day from point to point the instrument of the accord and covenants betweene him and the Romans; so he also would take up that good custome & practise the same, if not so continually, yet at leastwise many a time and often. But when he could by no meanes skare him nor avert his mind from warre, hee began at first to withdraw and absent himselfe, alledging for his excuse one while this occasion and other whiles that, because hee would not be present at the debating of those matters which he approoved not: & in the end perceiving that he was had in some jealousie, and otherwhiles charged to be a traitor, he changed his allegiance, revolted to the Romans, and served the Consull in right good stead. This Onesimus beeing (as is before said) brought into the Senat-house, related all these premisses: whereupon the Senat ordained, That he should be enrolled formally in the number of allies: also, that he should bee provided of a lodging, and his ordinarie expences for the time allowed at the cities charge. Moreover, that two hundred acres of land in the territorie of Tarentum, which was confiscate unto the people of Rome, should be set out for him; and a messuage in Tarentum bought for his habitation. To see all this performed, C. Decimus the Pretor had in charge.

The Censors upon the * thirteenth of December, tooke a survey of the number of citizens and an estimate of their goods, more straightly than aforesaid. Many were unknighted and had their horses taken from them; and P. Rutilius among the rest, who when hee was Tribune of the commons, had been their accuser and called them to violently to reckoning: degraded hee was besides and displaced out of his owne tribe, and made no better than a verie labourer in the cities workes. Now was the yeere come about and well-neere at an end, when by reason of the great care principally about the Macedonian war, men began to talke, whom they were to create for Consuls against the next yeere, to achieve and end the said warre: Whereupon there passed a decree of the Senate, That Cn. Servilius with all speed possible, should make hast to Rome for to hold the generall assembly of election. This decree Sulpitius the Pretor within few daies after read to the Consull, to the end that hee should repaire home into the citie before the day prefixed. Whereupon both the Consull hastened; and the said election also was finished by the day appointed. Consuls these were created, L. Aemilius Paulus the second time (even fourteene yeeres after his former Consulship) with C. Licinius Crassus. The day following were the Pretours also chosen, to wit, Cn. Baebius Tamphilus, L. Anicius Gallus, Cn. Octavius, P. Fonteius Balbus, Mar. Eburus Helus, and C. Papyrius Carbo. The careful regard of the Macedonian warre caused everie thing to be done with greater expedition. And therefore it was thought meet, that these new elect magistrates should cast lots out of hand for their provinces, that it might be knowne to whether Consull Macedonie, and to which Pretour the conduct of the navie should fall; that thereupon they might presently consider and provide for all things requisite to the warre, and require the advice of the Senat as need required. Ordained it was, when the Consuls were entered into their office, to solemnise the Larine festivall holidays as soone as they might conveniently, without offence of the gods and breach of any religious order: that the Consull whose lot fell to goe into Macedonie, were not detained behind upon any occasion. After these ordinances, Italie and Macedonie were nominated for the provinces of the two Consuls; and for the Pretours, the two civill jurisdictions within the citie of Rome, the navie, Spaine, Sicilie, and Sardinia. In fine, Macedonie fell to Aemilius the Consull, and Italie to Licinius. Of Pretours, Cn. Baebius was lord chiefe justice of the pleas of citizens, and L. Anicius of aliens. And if the Senate thought good to send the navie any whither, Cn. Octavius had the charge thereof as L. admiral, P. Fonteius was appointed by lot L. deputie of Spaine, M. Eburus of Sicilie, and C. Papyrius of Sardinia.

All men soone saw, that L. Aemilius intended not to goe coldly about the managing of that warre; both for that he was not an ordinarie man, but singular above all other; and also because that night and day hee mused and studied upon nothing else, but that which was requisite and pertinent thereunto. The first thing of all wherewith he went in hand was this; a request to the Senat for to dispatch certaine delegat commissioners into Macedonie, to visit the armies there and the armada; to make true report upon their certaine knowledge, what was needfull to be done for the supply of the forces as well by land as sea; also to lie in espiall and estimate as much as possibly they could, the kings power; moreover, what quarter of the province was taken up by our men, and which the enemies kept; whether the Romanes lay encamped still within the forests and pases, or if they were passed beyond the streights and come into the plaine and even ground; who continued trustie allies, who were suspected, who hung in doubtfull tearmes, (as whose faith depended upon fortune;) who seemed to be undoubted and professed enemies; how great the provisions were of victuals; from whence they were conveyed by land; from what places transported by water; and lastly, what exploits had ben performed the sommer past both by land and sea: supposing, that by a light given and certain intelligence delivered of these things, he might be surely directed in the casting and laying of future plots and designments. So the Senat granted out a commission to Cn. Servilius the Consull, for to send as delegats into Macedonie; such as L. Aemilius thought good of. Whereupon within two daies after, Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus and A. Licinius Nerva, took their journey as legats and commissioners. Newes came in the latter end of this yeere, that it rained stones twise, namely, in the territorie of Rome, and likewise about Veij: and therefore a novendiall sacrifice was celebrated. This yeere there died certaine priests, namely, Pub. Quintilius Varus, a flamine of Mars, and M. Claudius Marcellus a Decemvir: in whose rume was substituted Cneus Octavius. And now noted it was, that the magnificence and port of the people of Rome encreased, for that in the plaies and games called Circenses exhibited by Publius Cornelius Scipio Nasica and Publius Lentulus, Ediles Curule, threescore and three wild beasts out of Affricke, with fortie beares, and certain elephants, were baited to make sport unto the people.

When L. Aemilius Paulus and P. Licinius entered their Consulship upon the *fifteenth of March, March,

March, which was the beginning of the yeere following, the LL. of the Senate were in great expectation, and especially what the Consull would propose unto them as touching the Macedonian warre, which was his proper province. But Paulus said that he had nothing to propound and put to counsell, seeing that the Delegates aforesaid were not yet returned. And at Brundisium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voiage upon the sea been driven backe by tempest and cast upon Dyrhachium. But so soone as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledge of those things that first are to bee knowne, I will then consult; and that will bee within very few daies. Now to the end that nothing might stay & hinder his journey, he told them, that the even before the Ides of Aprill, was appointed for the solemnitie of the Latine festiual hollydaies. And after sacrifice duly performed [upon the Albane hill] the Senate should no sooner ordaine, but he and Cn. Octavius would set forth and put themselves on their way. As for C. Licinius his Colleague, his charge should bee in his absence to provide and send all things requisite and needfull for this warre. Meane while (quoth hee) the embassies of forraigne nations may have audience given. So when hee had sacrificed as the manner was, before they tooke in hand the great affaires of State, the embassadours of Alexandria, from king Ptolomeus and queene Cleopatra, were called in. Clad they were in poore array, the haire of their head long, their beards side and overgrown; and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive tree, they entred into the Senate, and fell grovelling and prostrate upon the floore. Their habite and apparrell was not so simple and mournfull, their looke and countenance not so heave and sorrowful, but their speech was more piteous & lamentable. Antiochus now king of Syria, & who had sometime ben hostage at Rome under a colourable pretence of honestie and equitie to restore Ptolomeus the elder to his kingdom, made hot war upon his younger brother, who then held Alexandria; and after a victorie obtained in sea-fight neere Pelusium, he made a bridge of haste work upon the river Nilus, over which he transported his armie, & now laid siege to Alexandria: so as by all likelihood he would shortly by way of conquest be lord of a most rich and wealthe kingdom. In which regard, these embassadours made pittifull mone and greevous complaint, beseeching withall the Senate, of their aid and succour to that realme and those kings, who were such friends to their siegnorie and dominion. For perswaded they were that the people of Rome had done so much for Antiochus in particular, and were of that account and authoritie with all other kings and nations, that if they would but send their embassadours to intimate thus much, That the Senat was not well pleased with waging warre upon confederate kings, he would presently raise his siege, depart from before the walls of Alexandria, and withdraw his armie cleane away into Syria. But if they protracted the time long and delayed thus to doe, then should Ptolomeus and Cleopatra within a while bee driven out of their realme, and forced to come to Rome with some shamefull spot of dishonour to the people of Rome, in that they had not set to their helping hand in that extreme danger of all their fortunes. The LL. of the Senate moved with compassion at the praiers of these Alexandrines, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius as embassadours to determine and make an end of the warre betweene those two princes. In commission they had first to goe unto king Ptolomeus, and then to Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased and gave over armes, they would take him neither for friend nor foe, whom it was long of that the warre was not given over. So these three together with the Alexandrine embassadours, tooke their leave within three daies and departed. Then the foresaid Delegates returned from out of Macedonie, the last day of the festiual games to Minerva called Quinquartus, and not before they were welcome; for so long looked for they were, that had it not bene eventide when they came, the Consuls would immediately have called the Senat together. But the morrow after, the Senate sat, and those commissioners had audience given. Report they made first, That with more daunger than profite ensuing, the armie entred into Macedonie over those pases and streights, where was no way and passage at all. Item, That the king kept the countrey of Pieria, into which the Roman armie was now advanced, and were so neere encamped one to the other, that nothing but the river Enipeus between kept them asunder; that neither the king made offer of battell, nor the Romans were of sufficient strength to challenge and force him to fight; moreover, that the winter had overtaken them (a time unseasonable for warlike exploits) that the soldiors were nuzzled and nourished in idleness, notwithstanding they had victuals to serve no longer than fixe daies; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirtie thousand strong. Were it so that Ap. Claudius had a good and sufficient power about Lychnidum, hee might bee able to trouble

A trouble the king, and put him to his trumpe in a battell; but now both Appius and the garrison with him, are themselves in extreme jeopardie, unlesse with speed either a complete armie bee sent thither, or els they drawne from thence where they are, into Macedonie. Over and besides they related, how from the campe they went toward the fleet, where they heard say, that some of the sea-faring men and mariners were dead of sickness, others, & namely those of Sicilie above the rest, were gone home againe to their owne houses, inso much as there were not men ynow to serve the ships; and those that remained, had neither their wages paid and money to put in their purses, nor liveries and apparell to hang on their backs. As for Eumenes and his fleet, they (like ships driven to a coast by force of wind and weather, without any other cause els) were come and gone againe; and it seemed that the mind of that king was not well settled and resolved. But as they reported all of Eumenes suspiciously, and in doubtfull termes, so they assured them of the singular fidelitie and constancie of Attalus his brother. When these Legates had spoke, then said L. Aemilius, Let us debate now in counsell what is to be done as concerning the said warre. So the Senate ordained, that for eight legions, the Consuls and the people should elect an equall number of martiall Tribunes or Colonels, the one as many as the other; & that none should be created and advanced to that place for that yeare, but such as had borne some honourable dignitie: then, out of all those Tribunes thus elected, that L. Aemilius should make choise for those two legions which were to goe into Macedonie, of whom he would himselfe: also, that after the solemnitie of the Latine feasts performed, L. Aemilius the Consull, and C. Octavius the Pretour and admirall of the fleet, should depart into their province. A third was joined in commission with them, to wit, L. Anicius the Pretor and lord cheefe justice for strangers. And ordained it was, that he should passe into Illyricum about Lichnidum, for to succeed Ap. Claudius. The charge of taking musters was put upon C. Licinius the Consull. Hee had commaundement to enroll seven thousand foot citizens of Rome, and two hundred horsemen, and to charge the Latine allies with a levie of seven thousand footmen and foure hundred horse. Also to send letters unto Cn. Servilius, who governed the province of Gaule, to enroll six hundred men of arms. This armie he had commaundement to send with all convenient speed to his colleague into Macedonie, so as in that province there should not be above two legions, and the same full and complete, containing six thousand foot & three hundred horse apeece. As for the surcease, as well of the Cavallerie as Infanterie, they should be disposed and bestowed in sundrie garrisons. And all such as were unmeet for service, were to be cassed and sent away. Moreover, the allies were put to set out and find ten thousand foot and eight hundred horse. And those were to serve in garrison under Anicius, over and above the two legions (which hee was commaunded to lead into Macedonie) consisting of five thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred horsemen either of them. Also for the navie were enrolled five thousand mariners and rowers. Licinius the Consull was appointed to defend and keepe in obedience his province with two legions, and to take besides of allies ten thousand foot and fixe hundred horse.

After these ordinances of the Senate were accomplished, L. Aemilius the Consull went forth of the Senate house into the common place before the assembly of the people, where hee made a speech unto them in this wise following: Me thinkes I perceive and see, my good friends and citizens of Rome, that yee have shewed more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation in my behalfe, for that the province of Macedonie is fallen to my lor; than either at the time that I was declared and saluted Consull, or that day whereupon I first entred into government: and for no other reason in the world, but upon the opinion which you have conceived, that the Macedonie an warre, which hath so long continued, may be brought by my meanes to such an end as becometh the greatieffe and majestie of the people of Rome. And for mine owne selfe I have good hope, that as the gods in favour have directed this sortilege, so they will bee present and propitious unto mee in performing the service. In these matters, I say, I am but carried partly with conceit and partly with hope. But this one thing I am assured of; yea and I dare affirme and promise on my owne head, that I will endeavour my selfe and employ all that is in me, that this your good opinion of mee may not bee in vaine conceived. As for all things necessarie and requisite to this warre, both the Senat hath ordained; and also, for that they have thought good I should depart immediately (for which my selfe am well pleased and contented, neither in me there shall be any delay) my colleague C. Licinius, a singular man and of great valour, will provide with as great care and diligence, as if himselfe had the full conduct of this warre. For the effecting whereof see, that whatsoever I shall write either to the Senate or to you, yee beleefe for true: as for running rumours which have no certaine author, give no care and beleefe thereto; neither feed them with your foolish credulitie. For now adaies verily, (a thing that I have observed to fall out ordinarily in this warre) there is no man setteth so little by the common brutes that are blazed abroad, but his spirit and courage may be thereby quailed and daunted. In all meetings now, yea and at every board (I would not else) yee shall have them; that in their table talk will lead your armies into Macedonie: that know where they are to lodge and encampe; what commodious places are to be seized and kept with garriſons at what time and through which passages the chury must be made into Macedonie; where the garnets and storehouses for corn should be build and set; which way by land and sea both, the provisions of victuals ought to be brought; when the time serveth to encounter and fight with the enemy, and when to sit still and rest. Neither are they content to set downe and pronounce, what is to be done for the better: but if ought happen to be managed otherwise than they have thought and judged expedient, they are so bold as to controll the Consull; yea and readie to commenſe processe against him judicially. These are throwd hinderances, I may tell you, to warriors and men of action. For all men have not the gift of resolution and constancie to neglect the speech and talke of men, as sometimes Fabius had, who chose rather to have his authoritie and commaund diminished and impaired by the follie and vanitie of fewd people, than with their favorable applause and good opinion to manage his affaires but untowardly. Yet take me not so, as if I were a man that would have no captaines to be admonished and advised by others; nay contrariwise, of this judgement I am, That hee who worketh all by his selfe-wit and followeth onely his owne head, is selfe-willed and proud, and nothing sage and wise. What is then to be done? First in mine opinion, Generals and commanders of armies; are to be instructed by discreet and prudent men; by such as are skilfull by profession in feats of armes and militarie science; by those also that by long practise are thoroughly experienced: nay more than that, they are to be taught and counsailed by them, that are usually present and conversant in the execution of affaires, who daily see the vantage of places, marke the proceeding of the enemies, and observe the opportunities of times: those (I say) who as passengers in one ship, are partakers of the same daunger. If there be any man therefore, who is verily perswaded of himselfe, that he is able to direct me and give me any counsell (in the conduct of this warre which I have in charge) for the good of the common weale, let him come forth, and not denie his helping hand to the weale publick, and go along with mee into Macedonie. Furnish him I shall, with ship, with horse, with tent-roume, with conduct money, and all things necessary for his voiage. If any be loth so to do, & had rather sit warm at home, preferring the ease and repose of the cittie before the travaile and paine of warfare, let him not here on the land take upon him to play the pilot and steersman at sea. Matter hee shall find enough within the cittie to talke of, & seeke no farther; let him hold him there and keep his babble & prattle to himselfe: know he (whosoever he is) that we will content our selves with our own counsell about us in the camp. After this oration ended, & the Latine festivals solemnized the day before the calends of March, together with the sacrifice duly celebrated upon the Albane mount; the Consull and the Pretour Cn. Octavius departed incontinently into Macedonie. It is recorded in the Chronicles, that the Consull was honoured with a greater frequentie that accompanied him, than usually had beene knowne: and that men presaged in manner assuredly, the end of the Macedonian warre: how the Consull should have a speedie returne, and obtaine a brave and glorious triumph.

During these occurrents in Italie, Perſeus who (because he was to be at the charges of disbursing money) never thought of it, to goe through with that which before he had begun, namely to adjoine unto him Gentius king of the Illyrians: so soone as hee perceived that the Romanes were entered the streights, and the warre come now to this extremitie of hazard; thought good now to make that sure and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had covenanted and promised by his embassadour Hippas three hundred talents of silver, with condition also, that for security hostages should be put in of both parties interchaungeably; hee sent Pantaucus one of his most trustie friends, to dispatch and make an end of this affaire. This Pantaucus met the Illyrian king at Medeon in the countrie of Labeatia: where hee both tooke an oath of the king, and also received his hostages. Gentius likewise sent his embassadour named Olympio, to demand the semblable oath of Perſeus; & require hostages accordingly: with him were certain persons sent of purpose

A purpose to receive the money, who also by the advise of the said Pantaucus were to goe in embassie with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio & Morſus. But they had in charge and commission, after the oath taken, after hostages & money received, to go to Rhodes, and not before. Good hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be solicited and iuduced to take armes against the Romanes, by using the name of these two kings at once: and this accompt they made, that if this state which carried the renowne and honour above all others for sea-service, would once combine and band with them; they should leave the Romanes no hope at all, either on land or sea. When these Illyrians arrived, Perſeus departed with all his cavallerie from before the river Enipeus where hee was encamped, and encountered them neere Dium. There, were all the accomplements performed according to the covenants, in the sight and mids of the cavallerie, whom the king of purpose would needs have to be present at this accord of association made betweene him and king Gentius, supposing that it would comfort and encourage them the more. So the hostages were given and taken in the presence of them all. They also who were to receive the money were sent to Pella where the king his treasure lay: and those that should goe to Rhodes with the Illyrian embassadours, had commaundement to imbarke at Thessalonica. Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes: who assured them by the meanes of Dion and Polyaratus, two principall personages of that cittie, that the Rhodians were prest and readie to warre. Whereupon the said Metrodorus was appointed the chiefe in this embassage of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the same time likewise was addressed and imparted both unto Eumenes and also unto Antiochus, such advise and counsell in common, as the present condition wherein their affairs stood, might minister & affoord argument. Namely, that a free citie and a king were two by nature, enemies that possibly could not sort together: That the people of Rome went in hand with them severally one after another: & (that which was a greater indignitie & unsupportable) used the force of kings to overthrow the state of kings. For so, by the aid of Attalus they had brought his father Philip to ruin: by the help likewise of Eumenes, and partly also of his father Philip, Antiochus was defeated; and even now against himselfe both Eumenes and Prusias were put in arms. If the kingdome of Macedonie were once subverted, have at Asia next; which the Romanes have in some part seized already for their owne; under a colour of enfranchising cities and setting them free: and then they will not leave untill they have Syria too. For now is Prusias preferred in honour before Eumenes; and Antiochus for all his conquest is chased and debarred out of Egypt, which ought to have bene the recompence for the war by him enterprised & achieved. In these regards Perſeus advertised each of them to consider and provide therefore either to force the Romanes to make peace with him, or else to hold them for the common enemies of all kings, in case they persisted still in so unjust a war. The commission that the embassadours had to Antiochus was avert & open: but unto Eumenes an embassadour was sent under a pretence of ransoming certain captives; but practised there were under hand more secret complots; which caused Eumenes even then to be suspected & odious unto the Romanes, yea, & charged afterward with more grievous matters, although untruly. For he was reputed little better than a traitor and a professed enemy to their state; whereas indeed both he & Perſeus strove who could compass, surprise, and overtake one another better in fraud and avarice. Now there was one Cydas a Cretensian, an inward and most secret friend to Eumenes: this man had communed first at Amphipolis with one Chimarus a countie man of his, who served under Perſeus in the wars; and afterwards at Demetrias conferred with another named Menecrates; also with a certaine third person called Antiochus, all captaines to king Perſeus, even under the very wals of the foresaid cittie. Over and besides, Eropon who at this time was sent, had beforetime ben employed in two severall embassies to the same Eumenes. These secret communications and embassages were badly spoken of; but no man knew what was concluded between the two kings. Howbeit thus the case stood; Eumenes as he had no mind nor intention to war upon Perſeus, so he was not desirous in his hart that he should have the victory of the Romanes; not so much for the old enmitie which had ben between both their fathers, as for the hateful quarrels kindled among themselves. For this concurrence and emulation there was between these two princes, that Eumenes could never abide to see Perſeus for to purchase so great welch, & so much honor, as he must needs acquire by the conquest of the Romanes: he saw moreover, that Perſeus from the first beginning of this war, fought by all meanes possible for peace, & the neerer he was to daunger & damage, aimed thereat every day more than other; employing his whole studie and care about nothing els.

He

He perceived also that among the Romanes, because the warre grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains as the Senat were well enough content and very desirous to see an end once of so troublesome, hurtfull, and difficult a warre. Knowing thus as he did, the mind and will of both parties, he inclined and framed to that which of it selfe as he thought might fall out, where the stronger was wearie and the weaker in feare: and therein desired he to shew his double diligence, thereby to win a thicke and purchase favour of both parts. For he entred into bargain with Perseus for a summe of money, one while not to aid the Romanes either by land or sea; another whiles to be a ritans for peace and to treat with the Romanes thereabout, and not to intermeddle at all in the warre; but to sit still: he capitulated (I say) for a thousand and five hundred talents; making semblance and shew, that for the assurance both of the one and the other, ready he was not only to sweare, but also to put in good and sufficient hostages. Perseus was the willingest man in the world to set in hand with this, as being driven thereto by the exigent of feare: and presently without delay dealt with him as touching the hostages which were to be received: and in fine concluded it was, that they should upon their deliverie and receipt be sent into Creete. But when they came once to talke of the money aforesaid, hee hasted and stucke at that: and to say a truth, either of these two summes (between princes of so great name and honour) was but a base and dishonest consideration; a thing much unfitting (ywis) the giver, and more the receiver. Perseus verily for his part, in hope to purchase peace with the Romanes, was willing enough to be at the expence of so much money: many, hee said that he would make payment thereof when the thing was done and accomplished: and in the meane time lay it up safe for that purpose within the temple of Samothracia. Eumenes againe, considering that the said Island was an appertenance to the dominion of Perseus, could not see but it was all one for it to lie there and in Pella: and therefore was earnest to have part therof in hand. Thus betwene them there was nothing but lying in the wind for the vantage, who could overreach the other: and what was gained in the end but infamie and discredit? As for Perseus, hee not onely let fall this design and lost his opportunitie, (and that by his niggardie only) when by the means of Eumenes he might have had either his money sure enough, or peace for it, (which indeed he should have bought, if it had cost him the one halfe of his kingdom,) and being once received into grace and favour [of the people of Rome] hee might have defamed and brought into obloquie and daunger his concurrent, by charging him to have received a peece of money for a bribe, and so justly have set the Romans upon his top: but also the association with king Gentius which now was at the point of a contract, was neglected; yea and a mightie army of Gauls spread at that time all over Illyricum and presented unto him, was even then refused and discharged by this pinching and saving of his mony. For there came and offered their service ten thousand horsemen and as many foot, and those so well practised and so good of footmanship, that they were able to hold out and keepe pace with horses, yea and run by their sides: such (I say) as when the riders were unhorsed and fallen, could vault and mount on the empty horse backs ready to fight in their turnes. These had bargained to have for pay every horseman ten *Philip peeces [of gold] paid down aforehand, and a footman five, and their captaine a thousand. Perseus departed from his leaguer lying neere the river Enipeus, and with the one halfe of his own forces met these comming upon the way, and caused proclamation to be made in all townes and villages neere the high waies, To make ready and bring abroad their provision of victuals, and see that there were plentie of corne, of wine, and cattails. Himselfe brought with him horses and trappings, and fine souldiours cassocks, to bestow as presents upon the chiefe of them, with some litle sprinkling of gold to deale among a few of them; supposing that all the rest besides of common souldiours, might be drawne on and retained with bare hope. Thus he came to the citie of Alamana, and encamped upon the banke of the river Axius. But the armie of these Galatians were lodged about Desudaba in the countrey of Macedonia, and rested there expecting the payment of the money aforesaid; according to covenant. But Perseus sent unto them Antigonus one of his gallants and courriers, to will and command the multitude of the armie to dislodge and remove to Bylazora, a place so called in Paronia, and a good sort of their chiefe to repaire unto him. Now were they threescore and fiftene miles from the river Axius and the kings campe. And when Antigonus had delivered unto them this mandate as hee had in charge, and added besides, with what care and diligence the king had laid his provisions by the way of all things in great plentie for the armie, and with what gifts of apparrell, silver, and horses, hee purposed to receive

* Philippeus nummus, was somewhat lesse than our six pence of 20 sh. or 3 denari.

A receive and entertaine their captains at their first comming unto him: As for that (say they) we shall take knowledge thereof when we are in presence personally: but now for this time, wee demand, Whether yee have brought with you in readie coine according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the souldiours, as well horse as foot? And when he could make no answer thereto, but was set non plus; then said Clondicus their prince, Goe your waies then (quoth hee) and tell your king and master, that the Gauls unless they may receive the gold, and hostages besides for their securitie, will not stirre one foot forward. Relation beeing made hereof unto the king, hee called his counsell: and when it was soone seene what they all would advise him to doe; himselfe, who could skill better to keepe his money together, than hold the roiall estate of his kingdome, began to enter into a discourse of the disloyaltie and savage nature of these Gauls; making remonstrance, how he had experience by the calamities and losses of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive so great a multitude of them within Macedonia, for feare the Gauls would be found worse neighbors, than the Romans were enemies. Five thousand horsemen are sufficient (quod he) and so many well we may have good use of in wars, and need not be afraid of them for their number. But every man saw well enough, that it was the waging of such a number that he feared, and nothing els: but when no man durst give him counsell, albeit he seemed to aske their advise, Antigonus was sent again with a message unto the Gauls, That the king stood in need of five thousand horsemen and no more, as for all the rest, he weighed them not. When these Barbarians heard that, all the rest began to mutter and grumble, yea, and to take great scorne and indignation, that they were levied and departed out of their native country for nothing: but Clondicus redemanded, Whether he would make present pay to those five thousand, according to covenant, yea or nay? but seeing that he was to seek, and made shifts to avoid a direct answer, he let this deceitfull messenger goe his waies, and did no harme unto his person (a thing that Antigonus himselfe would scarcely have thought could possibly have been:) And so after they had given the waite unto those parts of Thracia which lay neere to their way, they returned backe againe to the river Ister, Which power of men, if it had passed the streights of Perrebaia into Thessalie against the Romanes (although Perseus had not stirred at all, but sitten still at Enipeus) might not only have spoiled and laid bare the territorie all about, & empeached the Romanes for expecting any victuals there, but also destroyed the townes utterly, whiles Perseus held the Romanes play at Enipeus that they could not relieve and succour the cities of their allies and confederates. Nay the very Romanes should have had ynough to doe to looke unto themselves, considering that there was no tarrying for them, after that Thessalie was lost, which nourished and maintained their army: and passe forward they could not possibly, having the Macedonian campe to affront them. But Perseus by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romanes, so he quailed not a little the courages of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectancie of their aid. By the same miserable pinching of his, hee estranged also the heart of king Gentius from him. For when as at Pella he had paid three hundred talents unto those that were sent of purpose from Gentius to receive the same, wel content he was that they should seale up that mony. Afterwards he sent unto Pantaenus ten talents, and commanded him to deliver the same to the king in person: as for the rest signed up with the seale of the Illyrians, he commanded his owne men who had the convoy thereof, in going with it to take small journeys, and when they were come to the utmost frontiers of Macedonia, there to rest and attend the messengers from him. Gentius, after he had received as earnest that small portion of the whole sum aforesaid, being called upon continually by Pantaenus and set on to provoke the Romans by some hostilitie or other, made no more adoe, but committed to prison M. Perpetua and L. Petilius, who chanced at that time to come unto him in embassage. Which when Perseus once heard, he had enough and thought verily that Gentius had done that, whereby of necessitie hee must be forced to wage warre with the Romans: and thereupon sent out presently to call those backe who had the carriage of the foresaid talents; as if he had studied and sought for nothing more, than to reserve as great a bootie as possibly hee could, for the Romanes to enjoy, after that they had vanquished and subdued him. Eropon returned likewise from Eumenes, and wist not what had ben contrived secretly betwene them. That their treatie was about certaine captives, they themselves had given forth abroad, and likewise Eumenes advertised the Consul so much, for avoiding of all suspicion.

Perseus after the returne of Eropon from Eumenes, was much dismaied and cast downe. Whereupon upon, he sent Antenor and Callippus (admirals of his navie) to Tenedos, with fortie pinnaces, unto which number five Gallions were adjoined; who from that coast dispersing themselves all about the Ilands Cyclades, might waite and guard the lighters and hoies charged with corne, as they failed to Macedonie. These ships were put to sea at Cassandrea, and first they fell within the havens that lie under the foot of the mountaine Athos, and from thence passed to Tenedos with pleasure in calme sea: where finding certaine Rhodian open ships riding in the harbour, they spake courteously to Eudamus their admirall, & let them alone without any hurt at all done unto them. But afterwards upon knowledge, that fittie hulkes of theirs on another side were shut up & pent in by the warre-ships of king Eumenes (which rid in the mouth of the haven and were commaunded by Darius) hee turned about in all hast, and disperfed the enemies ships with a suddaine terror that hee put them in, and sent the said hulkes and vessels of burden into Macedonie, with a convoy of tenne brigantines to waite them over, with this charge, That after they had conducted them past all daunger into place of safetie, they should returne againe to Tenedos. After nine daies they retired toward the fleet ankering then in the rode of Sigæum. From thence they crossed over to Subota, an Iland lying betwene Elea and Athos. It fortuned, that the morrow after the fleet was arrived at Subota, five and thirtie ships which they call Hippagogæ [serving for the transporting of horses] which came from Elea, having aboard certaine horsemen of Gaule and their horses, made head toward Phanæ, a cape or promontorie of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Macedonie. And these were sent from Eumenes to Attalus. Antenor being advertised by a signall given him from a watch-tower, that those ships were discovered under saile in the open sea, loosed from Subota; and betwene the cape of Erythræa and Chios, where the sea is most narrow, hee encountered them. The admirals of king Eumenes thought nothing lesse, than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas; but imagined one while they were Romanes, otherwhiles, that it was Attalus or some sent backe from Attalus, who from out of the Romane campe were sailing toward Pergamus. But as they approached neerer, they tooke knowledge by the forme and fashion of their pinnaces who they were, by their hastie rowing also and making head full against them, they were out of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then were they mightily afraid, as having no hope to resist and withstand them, considering the ships were unweldie and unhandsome, and the Gauls besides could hardly brooke the very sea without any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were neerer to the firme land, saved themselves by swimming to Erythræa; others set up their sailes, and being cast upon the Iland Chios, forsooke their horses, and ran as fast as they could for refuge to the citie. But the barks discharged their armed souldiours neerer to the citie in a more commodious place for landing, where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and slew them; some in the way as they fled, others before the very gate of the citie, being kept out and excluded from thence: for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who pursued, had shut their gates upon them. Nine hundred *Gallio-greeces or very neere lost their lives and were hewen in peeces, and two hundred taken alive. As for the horses, part perished in the sea after the ships were split and broken, and the Macedonians hought and cut the strings of their gambrels of as many of them as they found upon the shore. Twentie of the best & fairest horses together with the prisoners, Antenor commanded that those ten barks which he had sent before, should transport to Thessalonica, and return againe with all speed to the fleet, for that hee would expect their comming at Phanæ. The fleet staid about three daies under the citie side, but afterwards went forward to Phanæ; and when the tenne pinnaces aforesaid were returned sooner than they looked for, they set up saile in the Ægean sea for Delos.

In this while the Roman embassadors, C. Popilius, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, departed from Chalcis, and arrived with three Quinquereme galeaces at Delos, where they found fortie Macedonian pinnaces, and five roiall Quinquereme galeaces of king Eumenes. The holinesse of the temple and island wherein it stood afforded securitie to them all, so as there was no hurt done nor violence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romanes as Macedonians, and besides, the sailers and mariners of king Eumenes conversed together, entermingled one with another in the temple, and the religious devotion of the place yielded them truce and surcease of hostilitie.

Antenor the admirall of king Persus, when hee was advertised from the watch and sentinell, that certaine ships of burden were seene a farre off in the sea, set saile and made after them him-

A selfe with part of his pinnaces, and part of them hee bestowed in awaite among the Cyclades, and saving those that directed their course toward Macedonie, he either drowned or spoiled them all; Popilius did the best he could, and Eumenes with his ships likewise, to save some; but the Macedonians, who sailed by night with two or three pinnaces at the most, deceived them, and were not discovered.

Much about this time the Macedonian and Illyrian embassadors came together to Rhodes; who carried the greater authoritie & credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the comming of their brigantines, which failed to and fro raunging over the Ægean sea, and among the Cyclades, but also by the conjunction and association of the two kings, Persus and Gentius, together with a rumour that ran of the Gauls, who were comming with a great number, as well of horse as foot. And now both Dion and Polyarchus, who tooke part with Persus, tooke more courage and heart unto them: by whose meanes there was not onely a gracious answer returned to the kings, but also pronounced openly it was, that by their authoritie they would make an end of the warre: in regard whereof, the kings also for their parts were to bee disposed and well willing to accept of peace.

Now was it the prime of the spring, when as the new generals were arrived into their provinces: Æmylius the Consull into Macedonie; Ocellianus to the navie at Oream; and Anicius into Illyricum, whose commission was to levie warre against Gentius. This Gentius was the sonne of Plauratus king of the Illyrians, and Eurydica was his mother: two brethen he had, to wit, Plator of the whole blood by father and mother both, and Caravantius onely by the mothers side. This C halfe brother he lesse suspected, by reason of his base parentage from the father; but as for Plator he murdered, together with two especiall friends of his: Ettrius and Epicadus (brave men of action) to the end that he might reigne in more safetie and securitie. The voice goeth, that hee carried an envious eye to that brother of his, for that hee had espoused Etuta the daughter of Hannus the prince of the Dardaniens; as if by this marriage he meant to make himselfe strong and combine with the Dardanian nation: and the more likelihood this carried with it after hee married the dauidess indeed. When he had made away Plator, and rid himselfe of the feare that he might have of his brother, he began to molest and oppresse his owne naturall subjects: and as hee was by nature given to violence, so that indisposition of his hee set on fire with untemperate drinking of wine. But as we said before, being mooved and incited to warre against the Romanes, hee assembled all his forces together unto Lissus, to the number of fifteen thousand armed men, and sent his brother from thence with a thousand foot and 50 horse against the Cavians, for to subdue that nation either by force or feare, whiles himselfe led his armie five miles against the citie Bassania from Lissus. Now were the Bassanians confederat allies of the Romans: and therefore when they were first solicited by messengers to yeeld, they resolved rather to endure a siege than doe so. As for Caravantius hee was peaceably and friendly received at his first comming into Durium, a town of the Cavians: but Caravantis another citie, made the gates fast against him: and as he gave the waite to the territorie about it, certaine of his souldiours straggling here and there, were by the peafants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head against them.

E And now by this time Appius Claudius having taken with him, over and above his own armie, the auxiliaries of the Bullians, Appolloniates, and Dyrrhachians, dislodged out of the place where he had wintered, & encamped neer the river Genusius. For hearing of the alliance made betwene Persus and Gentius, and incensed besides with the outrage committed upon the Romane embassadors, whom Gentius put in prison, he resolved certainly to war upon him. Anicius the Pretour being at that time at Apollonia, and advertised in what manner the affairs stood in Illyricum, dispatched letters beforehand to Appius: willing him to attend at Genusius for his comming: and so within three daies after came himselfe to the campe there; and to those aids which he had of his own, he took with him two thousand foot & two hundred horse, drawn out of the youth and flower of the Partines. Of the Infanterie Eppidas had the conduct, and Agathus F commaunded the Cavallerie. With this power hee prepared to goe into Illyricum, principally for to levie the siege before Bassania: but this designe projected by him, was unperched by a bruit that was blowne of certaine pinnaces which waisted and spoiled the sea-coasts. A fleet they were together of eightie saile, sent from Gentius by the instigation of Pantakeus, to fortay the territories of Apollonia and Dyrrhachium. Then the fleet

Which beeing surrendered, they submitted also and yielded themselves. And so consequently, G other cities of that countrie one after another did the semblable: and the inclination and disposition of mens minds that way, was much set forward by the clemencie and justice of the Romane Pretour which he used toward all. Then they marched to Scodra, the capitall place and seat-towne of the warre: not onely for that Gentius had seized upon it for his owne selfe, as the chiefe strength and fortresse of all his realme, but also because it was the strongest peece of all the Labeates nation, and very difficult for access. Enclosed it is with two rivers: to wit, Glausa which runneth along the East side of the citie, & Barbana on the West, arising out of the mountaine Labeatis. These two rivers joine in one, and are discharged together into the great river Oridus: which springing from the mountaine Scodrus, and encreased still with the confluence of many other waters and rivers, falleth at length into the Adriaticke sea. This Scodrus is the highest hill by odds of all other in those quarters: on the East it hath Dardania under it, on the South Macedonie, and Illyricum on the West. Albeit this towne was strongly situate, by the naturall site of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the king himselfe in person: yet the Romane Pretour (encouraged with the good successe he had at the first, & supposing the fortune of the totall warre would be answerable to so happie beginnings, and that a suddaine terrour also would serve him in much stead and prevaile) approached the walles of the towne with his armie readie embattailed, and displayed his banners against it. Now if they had shut their gates, and defended their wals and towers over the gates, with armed guards bestowed accordingly, surely they had repulsed the Romanes from the wals, and defeated them of their enterprize cleane: but they yielded forth of the gate, and in the plaine and even ground gave battle with more animositie and courage, than they maintained it with persistence. For being discomfited and driven backe, and in the chase huddled by heaps together as they fled, after 200 and above were slaine in the very streight entrance of the gate, they put the rest within in such a fright, that Gentius incontinently sent unto the Pretours as oratours, Tenticus & Bellus the principall persons of that nation, to treat and intreate for a surcease of armes, that in the meane while he might debate in counsell and be advised as touching the main estate of his affaires. And when for this purpose he had obtained a graunt for three daies, and the Romanes lay encamped from the citie halfe a mile, Gentius took a barge, and sailing along the river Bartana, passed into the lake or meere of the Labeates, as if he had sought some secret by-place to consult in. But as it appeared afterwards, he was mooved upon a certain vain hope of his brother Caravaninus his coming, who was said to bee neere at hand accompanied with many thousands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was sent. But when this rumour was over-blown and vanished to nothing, down the river he went again with the stream the third day after in the same vessel to Scodra, & sent couriers before him to the Pretor, requiring leave to parley and commune with him; which being granted, he entered into the camp. First he began his speech with accusing and condemning his own follie: in the end his last refuge was to poure out praies and shed teares: and so humbling himselfe at the Pretour his feet, he submitted to his devotion. The Pretour at the first bad him take a good heart unto him and be of good cheere, and invited him to supper: and so he returned to his owne people into the citie, where he was honourably feasted that day by the Pretour. But afterwards he was delivered to the guard and keeping of C. Cassius a martiall colonell: and thus received he of K. Perseus onely ten talents (a mean reward & hardly sufficient to content a simple sword-plaier) to engage himselfe into a world of daunger; and being a king as he was, to fall into this extreme calamitie and miserie. Anicius having entred upon Scodra, first before all other things, tooke order that the two embassadors aforesaid, Petilius and Perpenna should be sought out and brought unto him: whom after he had restored to their pristine estate and reputation, he sent Perpenna presently to apprehend the friends and kinsfolke of the king: who took his way directly to Medeo a citie of the Labeates, and brought with him into the campe at Scodra Elleva the kings wife, with her two tonnes Scerdiletus and Plecuratus, together with Cleaxantius the king his brother. Thus Anicius having ended the Illyrian war within the space of thirtie daies, sent Perpenna to Rome with tidings of this victorie; and within few daies Gentius himselfe after him, together with his mother, his wife and children, his brother and other L.L. of the Illyrians. This was the onely warre atchieved and brought to an end before they heard at Rome that it was begun.

During the managment of these affaires, Perseus also was in great feare and affliction, by reason

A son of the comming of L. Amylius a new Consul (who as the voice went, marched against him with great menaces) together with O. Flavius the Pretour. Neither was he lesse terrified with the Romane navie and the daunger of the sea coasts. Eumenes and Athenagoras had the keeping and commaund of Theffalonica with a small garrison of two thousand targatiers. Thither hee sent capitaine Androcles also, with commaundement to encampe close to the very harbour where the ships lay in rode. Unto Aenia he sent one thousand horsemen under the leading of Antigonus, to guard the sea-coast, to the end that in what part soever they heard the enemies ships were arrived, they might incontinently advaunce to the succour of the paissants and countrie people. Five thousand Macedonians were likewise sent to lie in garrison at Pythoum and Petra, under the conduct of Histiatus, T. heagenes and Midon. After these were departed, he went in hand to fortifie the banke of the river Enipeus: because it was passable over the very chanel on drie foot. And to the end that all the multitude should be employed hereabout, the very women were compelled out of the townes adjoining, to bring victuals into the campe. The souldiours were commaunded from out of the woods neere by

* * * * *

Finally the waterbearers in leather bits or bottels, were commaunded to follow him to the sea, which was a quarter of a mile off: and thereupon they stood to dig pits, some in one place, and some in another, a pretie distance asunder. The exceeding high hills all about put him in good hope (and the rather because they sent out from them no rivers to be seen in open view) that they contained within them some hidden springs, the veins whereof draining into the sea, were intermingled with the sea water. They had scarcely sunke thogh the uppermost course of sand above, when they might see small sources to boile up, at the first troubled, but afterward they began to yeeld sheere and cleere water in great abundance; by a speciall gift (as it were) of the gods above. And even this occurrent also encreased the name and reputation of the capitaine with his souldiours. Then after hee had commaunded his men to make readie their armour, himselfe with the martiall Tribunes and the principall formost ranks, marched to recognise: and view the passages; and to see where the armed men might descend with ease, and where they might with least trouble mount up the banke on the farther side. When hee had taken a sufficient survey hereof, hee forecast and gave direction aforehand, for all things to be done in the armie in good order without trouble & tumultuous noise, even at the very beck and commaundement of their leaders. For when a thing to be effected is pronounced to all at once, it falleth out that every man is not within the hearing; and so receiving an uncertaine signall and commaundement, some put more of their owne head to that which was commaunded, and others doe lesse againe for it: and so there arise from all parts dissonant cries; and by this meanes the enemies know sooner whereabout they goe, than many of themselves. Therefore to avoid this confusion, he obtained that every martiall Colonell should give a secret watch-word to the principall Centurion of the legion, and round him in his eare what he would have done; then he and so forth every one should deliver unto ech centurion as he is next in range & place, what was to be executed; whether it were that the commaundement was to be carried from the front of the armie to the taile, or from the reterguard behind to the vaward before. He broght up a new order & custome, forbidding the watchmen to carrie with them any targuets to their sentinels: for that the watchman went not out to fight, whereby he needed any armor, but to keep watch; that when he descried the enemies comming, he might retire himself, & raise others to take armes. Item, he ordeined that the helmettiers or morioners should stand upon their feet, having their shields upright before them: & when they were wearie, to leane & bear upon their javelins; & resting their head upon the edge of their shields, so to take a nap & sleep; to the end that their glittering armour might be discovered as farre off by the enemy, whereas himselfe could not see farre before him. The manner also of warding in the day-time and of the corps de guard hee altered cleane. For whereas they were wont to stand all the day long armed, and the horsemen holding their horses bridled in fell out so, that in summer daies when ordinarily the sunne is extreme and scorching hot; both horse and man became wearie and languished againe with abiding so many houres in the heat, and oftentimes the enemies being fresh, although they were but fewe in number, set upon them and put them to trouble and hazard enough. Hereupon he commaunded that the morning guard should break up at noone, and others succeed in their places for to ward in the afternoon. By this meanes the enemy fresh and in heart could never take them weak and so charge upon them. When he had pronounced in a publicke assembly gathered together, ther, that his will was, that these orders should be observed accordingly, he delivered unto them a speech, much resembling the former Oration which hee used before to the people within the citie of Rome. Namely, that the Generall of an armie ought onely to foresee and provide for all that is meet to be done, sometime by himselfe, otherwhiles with those whom hee hath joined assistants unto him: as for such as are not called to be of his counsell, they ought neither in publick nor in privat to shoot their bolts, and give their advice. Three things in deed the souldior was to care & provide for: namely, to have a body most strong and nimble withall, his armor & weapons decent and fit; and thirdly, a spirit prompt & ready at all assaies to execute any commandment on a sodain. For all things else he ought to know, that the gods immortal and his Generall will take care: forasmuch as, in that armie wherein the souldiors, the Confull, and chiefe commander, suffer themselves to be caried away with rumors & brutes of the common sort, it is not possible for any thing to go well forward and come to good effect. For his own part (according to the dutie and devoir of a captain Generall) he would endeavor & provide to give them the occasion and opportunitie of brave exploits: as for them, they were not to enquire after any future thing; but so soon as the signall is given, then every man to performe the service of a doubtie souldior and valiant warrior. After these good precepts and instructions, he dismissed the assembly: and the old souldiors themselves confessed commonly in plaine tearmes, that they had taken forth a lesson that day as yong and raw novices, yea and learned in militarie profession, that which they never knew before: neither shewed they only by these and such like words, with what content and generall liking they heard the Confull his speech, but also testified the same by present deed and visible effect. For immediatly, you should not have seene over all the campe, one man idle and doing nothing: some fell to whet and sharpen their swords; others furbished their headpeeces, buffes, and beavers: some skoured their shields and bucklers; others their cuirasses and corslets; some fitted and buckled their harness to their bodies, and tried how they could bestime their limmes and rule their joints under it: some shooke their pikes and couched their javelins; others brandished their swords and lookt that they were sharpe at point: So as a man might easily perceive by them, that upon the first occasion presented of encounter with the enemy, they would enter into conflict, either to achieve a brave victorie, or to die an honourable death.

Perseus also on the other side, perceiving that upon the arrivall of the Confull and the beginning of the spring together, the Romane camp refounded and rung again with their stirring and ruttling of armour, as if there had beene some new warre toward: that they were dilodged from Phylla and encamped upon the banke just over against him: and that now their leader and commander rode up and downe to view and behold his fortifications and workes, to spie (no doubt) some way or other for passage.

This encouraged the Romans hearts, and daunted not a litle the Macedonians and their king. At the first, Perseus endeavoured to suppress secretly and stop the bruit and fame thereof, by sending out certein of purpose to Pantaneus (as he came from thence) to forbid him in any wise to approach the campe. But by this time were certein children seen brought by their owne parents among the Illyrian hostages: and spoke how much more carefull order was taken to conceale, so much the sooner was every thing set abroad and blurted out by the prattle and babble of the kings servitours attending about his person.

About the same time the Rhodian embassadours came into the Romane campe, with the very same charge and commission as touching peace; which at Rome had set the L.L. of the Senat in exceeding heat and choller; but farre worse audience had they in the councill of the campe, and with greater discontentment. And therefore when some advised, that they should be thrust out by head and shoulders without any answer at all; the Confull pronounced, That he would shape them an answer after fiftene daies, and not before. Meane while (that it might appear what a goodly reckoning was made of these Rhodian peace-makers who came about a pacification) he began in steed thereof to debate in councill as concerning the means and manner of making war. Some were of opinion (and principally the elders and auncients) to give the assault, and force the munitions and defences planted upon the bank of the river Enipeus; for that the Macedonians were never able to resist, if they came upon them lustily and charged them by thicke troops: for why? no longer ago (say they) than the year before, dislized they had ben of so many holds both higher and better fortified, and the same holden with strong garisons. Others were of mind, that Octavius the admirall should with the fleet sail to The Salonica, and by laying wast the maritime coasts, to cut off and weaken the kings forces; to the end, that upon another warre shewed from behind at their backs, the K. might be withdrawn and trained about to defend the heart of his realme, and thereby forced in some sort to open and lay naked the passage over the river Enipeus. And Octavius himselfe was of this judgement, that the banke as well by the naturall site thereof, as for the sconces made upon it by mans hand, was unsuperable and not to be gained: and besides the engins planted every where thereupon, hee heard say, that the enemies had the slight and skill to discharge all kind of shot farre better and shoot more dead sure: but the intention of the Generall Emilius was wholly bent another way: and after he had dissolved the assembly of his councill, he called unto him two merchants of the Perthabians, namely, Schenus and Menophilus (men of approved fidelitie and wisdom) and of them in great secret enquired,

What kind of passages there were over into Perthabia? when they answered, That the wayes were nothing difficult and dangerous, but onely that they were kept and beset by the kings guards; he conceived some hope, that if he assailed them by night with a valiant companie, and tooke them sodainly at unawares before they looked for him, hee might chase those garisons from their holds: for darts, arrowes, and all other shot, served to little or no purpose in the darke, when a man cannot see his marke a farre off before him; but close sword-fight, hand to hand pell mell, was it that must doe the deed: wherein the Romane souldior had no fellow. Minding therefore to use those two as guides, he sent for Octavius the Pretour: and when he had declared unto him the effect of his designment, he commaunded him to saile with his fleet to Heraclea, and to have with him victuals baked and dressed to serve a thousand souldiours ten daies.

Himselfe sent out P. Scipio Nasica and Q. Fabius Maximus his owne sonne, with five thousand select souldiors to Heraclea (as if they were to be embarked) for to wait the maritime coast of Macedonie, lying farre within the countrey, according as it had been before debated in councill; and secretly under-hand they were given to wit, that there were viands and victuals in the fleet prepared for them, to the end that nothing should stay their expedition. Then the guides who were to conduct them in their way had commaundement, so to cast their gifts and journeis, that by three of the clocke in the morning the third day, they might assaile Pythoum. Himselfe in his owne person the next morrow, with intent to amuse the king and keepe him from all regard of other enterprises, early by the breake of day began to skirmish with the enemies guards in the very mids of the channell and place of the current. The light armour and forlorne hopes as well of the one side as the other, mainteined the fight: for it was not possible for souldiors heavily armed at all peeces, to skirmish in the channell, so uneven as it was. The descent from the bankes on either hand to the foresaid channell, contained somewhat lesse than three hundred paces, or litle better than a quarter of a mile: the middle space of the stream betweene (hollowed and eaten with the current, in some place more, in others lesse) tooke up litle above a mile. In this middle plot was the medley mainteined within the view and eye of the king of one side, who looked upon them from the rampier of the camp; and of the Confull of the other, who beheld them standing with his legions. The kings auxiliaries lightly armed, fought better a farre off by the meanes of their darts and other shot. The Romans were more firme and steadie, yea and better defended with their round bucklers or Ligurian shields. About noontide the Confull commaunded to found the retreat unto his men; and so for that day the fray was parted, not without much bloodshed on both sides. The next morrow by sun-rising they fell to it againe, and fought more eagerly by reason that their bloud was up and their stomaches sharpened the day before: but the Romans received hurt not only by them with whom they entred into fight, but much more also from a number of those who stood in turrets and petie sconces erected here and there; who discharged at them all kind of darts and shot, but hurled stones especially. And when they approached ones neere to the banke where the enemies were, their bullets levelled out of engins, commaunded and reached even them that were utmost and farthest off. The Confull having lost that day more men by many than before, caused them to retire somewhat later than the former day. The third day hee forbore to fight, but turned aside toward the nether quarter of the campe, as if he minded to assay passage by an arme of the river that bended to the sea. Perseus having before his eyes

Now was it the season of the yeer past sun-stead in summer, and neere unto the houre of noonsaith, i. the fault of blasting with heat in the dog-daves. Livie also in the speech of Quintus to the Embassador of K. Antiochus, by Solstitialis dies, meaneth the hottest time of summer, as by Brumalis dies elsewhere, the mid-winter. Finally, Plutarch expresseth this place thus: Ἐπειδὴ τὸ ἔσθινον for the hottest season of the summer one-ly. Thus Plinius in Pseudolo useth Solstitialis herba, for an one-dry-herb, withering away with heat of the sunne: and in Ternummo, Solstitialis morbus, for Sinaxis, i. cum carbuncular arboris nimis ardoribus solis sub Sirio, as Plinie

*Namely, the newest that king Genetius was vanquished, and that he and his kingdom was at the devotion of the Romans.

*Solstitialis dies, i. the hottest season of the summer one-ly. Thus Plinius in Pseudolo useth Solstitialis herba, for an one-dry-herb, withering away with heat of the sunne: and in Ternummo, Solstitialis morbus, for Sinaxis, i. cum carbuncular arboris nimis ardoribus solis sub Sirio, as Plinie stead in the day, so as they journeyed in a way full of dust, when the sun was exceeding hot; and even now they began to feeble thirst and weariness alreadie: but it seemed evidently, that when high noon was come indeed, they would be more troubled with the one and the other. Whereupon Æmylius resolved, not to prevent his men thus tormented and afflicted, unto the enemies all fresh and in heart: howbeit so sharpe set they were on both sides, and so eager upon fight, that the Consull had as much need by some cunning cast or other to deceive and beguile his owne men, as to delude his enemies. Before they were all embattailed and set in array, hee was earnest with the martiall Tribunes, and called upon them to make hast and put them in ordnance: himselfe rode about from ranke to ranke, and by his comfortable words encouraged and incensed the hearts of his souldiours to fight. At the first they were all very lustie and called for the signall of battaile; but afterwards, as the heat of the weather encreased, so their visages seemed lesse vigorous, and their voices more heave and dull; nay some of them stood leaning H on their targuets, and rested themselves bearing upon their javelins. Then he made open shew of his meaning, and in plaine termes commaunded the formost companies in the vaward, to measure out the forefront of a campe, and to lay downe their baggage: which when the souldiours perceived, some of them there were who rejoyced openly, for that he had not forced them to fight, so wearie as they were with travailing, and during that most scorching and burning heat. About the Generall stood his lieutenants with the captains of strangers, and Attalus himselfe among the rest. All of them allowed and thought well of the matter, all the while they thought no other but that the Consull would verily fight: for he had not so much as made them acquainted with this delay and lingering of his. But then seeing the case altered and the purpose changed, all the rest held their peace: onely Nassus of them all was so hardie and bold as to tell the Consull his mind and admonish him to take heed, that hee suffered not the enemy by avoiding fight, to slip and escape out of their hands, like as he had mocked and beguiled other Generals before him: for he feared much, least he would dislodge and depart in the night, and so they should be driven to pursue him with exceeding great travaile and daunger into the inland middle parts of Macedonie: so as the armie should bee put to wander up and downe all about through the blind lanes and over the narrow streights of the Macedonian mountains, like as it happened to other captains before him. And therefore he counsellled him in good sadness, while he had the enemy within the open plain field, to charge upon him and not to loose the opportunitee of a goodly victorie now presented. The Consull, nothing at all offended with this franke advertisement of so noble a young gentleman, said no more but thus unto him: The day hath been (Nassus) when I carried that spirit with me which you doe at this present: and the time will come when you will be of that mind, of which I am now. Taught I am by experience of many adventures and casualties in warre, to know, when it is good time to fight, and when it is better to forbear and sit still. For this present needlesse it is and bootlesse (standing as we doe now arraunged in order of battell) to tell you what motives they be, that induce me to thinke it better to be quiet and not to stir this day: another time demaund the reasons thereof; and rest contented I advise you, with the authoritie and credite of an old warrior and experienced captain. The young man was blanke and said not a word: persuaded he was doubtlesse, that the Consull saw some impediments to stay the battell, which to himselfe appeared not. Paulus, when hee perceived that the camp was set and quartered out, and the cariages bestowed accordingly, drew first out of the reregard the Triarii; then afterwards the Principes, whiles the Hastati or pikes kept their standing still in the vaward (if haply the enemies should offer battell); at the last hee withdrew them also, beginning first at the right point, taking by little and little the souldiours from every ensigne one after another. By this meanes were the footmen had away without any trouble and tumult, and the horsemen together with the light armour opposed against the enemy in the front and head of the maine battell before the enemies: neither was the Cavallerie called backe from these stations wherein they were placed, untill the forefront of the rampier & trench was fully finished. The king likewise, who without any refusal of battell had stood readie that day to fight, contenting himselfe with this, that he knew the stay thereof was occasioned by the enemy, led his companies backe into his campe. After the Romanes were encamped and well fortified, C. Sulpitius Gallus, a martiall Colonell of the second legion, who had bene Pretour the yeare before, by permission of the Consull called the souldiours to a generall audience, and before them all declared and pronounced, that the next night following there would bee seene an eclipse

A eclipse of the moone, from the second hower of the night untill the fourth: and this hee did because no man should wonder thereat, as if it were a prodigious token. Also hee made demonstration unto them, that it might bee well fore-knownne and fore-told, because it is a thing comming at certaine times by the ordinarie course of nature. For like as they nothing marvelled at the rising and going downe both of sunne and moone at set houres, nor to see the moone sometime shine bright out at the full, otherwhiles in the waine, giving light onely with the small tips of her horns: even so they ought not to make a wonder & miraculous matter of it, that she should be dark, when as her bodie is hidden by the shaddow of the earth. Thus the moon was eclipsed at the hour before prognosticated, overnight before the *even of the Nones of September: by occasion wherof, the Roman souldiours held Gallus for a deeply learned Sage, & a divine *4 Septemb. Philosopher: but contrariwise the Macedonians were troubled with the sight thereof, as an heaveie prodigie, portending and presaging the ruine of that realme and the utter destruction of the whole nation. And surely the howling and yelling which they made in their campe all the while, untill the moone recovered her full light againe, was a very prognostication and prediction of no lesse. The morrow after both the armies were so hore set and greedie of fight, that both king and Consull were blamed by some of their owne souldiours, for that they went out of the field the day before, and stricke not a battell. As for the king, he had his excuse and defence readie, not onely because the enemy refused the fight first, in open view of all men, and so retired his forces into his campe, but also in that he had pight and raunged his ensignes in such a place, unto which the Macedonian battell called Phalanx could not advance, considering that with the smallest disadvantage of the ground, there is no use at all thereof. The Consull for his part, as the day before he seemed to have pretermitted & lost the opportunitee of a combat, yea, and to have given the enemy advantage to depart in the night season (if he had so list) so now also hee trifled out the time, making semblance of sacrifice, whereas the signall of battell at the point of day was put forth for the souldiours to enter into the field. Well, at the last when the sacrifice was duly performed, about the third houre of the day, he assembled his counsell about him; where, some there were that thought he prolonged the time for the nonce, with his discourses and unseasonable consultations, and spent that opportunitee so, which should bee employed better in fight and execution of some worthie exploit. Howbeit, after some speeches passed, the Consull made an Oration unto his souldiours in this wise. Pub. Nassus (quoth he) a right valiant yong gentleman, D of all those that advised to give battell yesterday, was the onely man that uttered his mind, and acquainted me with his counsell, yet afterwards, even hee held his peace and kept silence, in such sort, as he seemed to change his opinion, and to be of my mind in the end. Some others there be that have taken a severall course by themselves, and thought it better to carpe at their Generall behind his backe, than to admonish him to his face. As for me, I will not thinke much nor make it daintie, to render a reason both to you, Pub. Nassus, and to them also who have thought the same that you did (although they caried it more secretly) why I made such stay and deferred battell. For, so far off am I of repenting for our yesterdaies repose, that I am of this beleefe rather, how by that meanes and policie alone I saved the whole armie. And because none of you may thinke that I have taken such a pitch, and hold that opinion of mine without just cause, let him E consider and discourse together with mee (if hee thinke so good) what advantages the enemies had, and how many things made against us. First and formost, how farre they surpasse us in number, assured I am that none of you either was ignorant before, or could chuse but observe and marke yesterday, seeing their armie how it was thrust and thronged together. And of that small number which we are, the fourth part of our fighting men was left behind to guard the carriage; and well ye wot, that we set not the most cowards to the keeping of our baggage. But suppose we had been all there together. How then? thinke wee, I pray you, that wee have not ynough of it, even out of this very campe wherein we have rested one whole night, to goe either this day or to morrow at the furthest, with the leave and power of the gods into the field, if you shall so thinke good? Skilleth it not indeed, and is it all one, to bid a souldiour take armes, whome neither the F travell of this daies journey, nor toile of labourious worke, hath tainted and wearied, but is at ease and quiet, yea, and fresh within his tent, and so to bring him forth into the field for a battell lustie and strong, full of bodily vigour and courage of heart, or to offer and expose unto the enemy who is heartie and fresh, who hath taken his rest and ease, and hath brought with him to a fight his strength entire and whole, not foiled or spent upon any occasion; to present, I say, unto such

such an enemy, a souldiour tired out with long journey upon the way, wearied with carrying his lode and burden, all molten to sweat and dropping therewith, his throat burnt and scorched for drought & thirst, his face and eyes full of dust, and all his bodie roasted against the noone sunne? Now tell mee, by the faith yee owe to the gods, what is hee that beeing in this so good a light, (were he the veriest beast and coward otherwise in a countrey) could not foile and beat out of the field the hardiest and most valiant man that is? Moreover, what should I say how materiall and important this also was, that our enemies had marshalled their battailons with great leisure after long time of rest; that they had repaired & refreshed their own strength, and stood ranged every man orderly in his owne ranke; whereas we were at one instant both hastily to embattle and set our men in array, yea and also to fall to a medley pell mell without all order? But, may some man say, True it is, our battaile in deed wee should have had much out of square and shuffled in great confusion: yet our campe was well fortified; we had forecalt and provided for good watering, the passage thereto was good and safe by reason of strong guards placed every way; and all coasts were cleared about us by our espials. Nay ywis: but contrariwise, nothing (to say truly) was ours, but the bare and naked plaine field where we were to fight. Youraunces in times past, esteemed a campe fortified with rampiers and trenches, as good as a port and harbour of sure refuge, for an armie against all chaunces and misfortunes whatsoever: from thence to issue forth, and thither to retire for safetie, after they had bin tossed and beaten with the tempest of a battaile. And therefore when it was empaled round about with good defences, they had a care also to reinforce and strengthen it with strong guards; for as much as he that hath lost his camp and is turned out of it, is ever holden for vanquished, notwithstanding he woon the day and had the better in the field. The hold of a campe serveth for a place of retreat to the conqueror; and of refuge to the conquered. How many armies could I reckon, which having sped but badly in the battaile, were driven to take their leaguer; yet afterwards seeing their time and spying their vantage, otherwhiles sallied forth, and in the turning of an hand repulled and discomfited the enemy, for all his former victorie? This feat and retreat of souldiours in time of warre, resembleth as a man would say, another native countrey of theirs; the rampier serveth in stead of walls, the tent and pavilion is to every souldiour his house & home. And should we have fought in deed like vagabonds without any place of mansion whereunto we might betake our selves after victorie? But against these difficulties and impeachments of giving battaile, this one thing is objected: How and if the enemy (say some) had gone his waies last night between; what a foule deale of trouble and sorrow should we have endured againe in pursuing him as far as to the heart, nay to the very farthest frontiers of Macedonie? But for my part verily, hold this for certaine, that if he had ever ment and resolved to have started from hence, he would never have staid thus heere as he hath done, nor brought his forces out into the field. For how much more easie was it for him to depart and be gone when we were farther off, than now when we are readie to tread upon his heeles, and goe over his backe? Surely he could not possibly have given us the slip, but wee should have bene ware of his dislodging, either by day or night. But, say he had gone his waies, what could we have wished more at the gods hands, than to set upon the taile & back part of the enemies in the open plaine ground, departing in disarray disbanded one from another, as they abandoning their fort & strong hold, & whose camp situate most sure upon an exceeding high and steepe banke of a river, fortified also with a rampier, & many a sconce and turret beside, wee gave the venture to assault? Lo, what the causes were, why the battaile was put off from yesterday to this present. For I must tell you, I am as willing my selfe to trie the fortune of a field as any other: and to that end (because the adventures to the enemy over the river Enipeus were stopped up against us) I have found a new way through another pafe & streight, by dissembling the guards of the enemies there left; and never will I give over untill I have defeated him quit and brought this war to an end. After this oration all kept silence, partly for that many of them were woon to his opinion; and partly because they feared to find fault to no purpose & so to give offence, when a thing howsoever once past and forlipt, cannot be recalled and amended. But that day neither was there battaile fought, for any great desire that the Cos. or king had thereto. The king wished it not; because he was now to charge his enemies, not weary of their way as the day before, nor troubled about their embattailing in such sort, & hardly at the last brought into ordinance: The Consull againe had no great stomacke thereto, for that his campe newly pitched, was provided neither of fewell nor forrage brought in and laid up already: and for the purveiance thereof, out of the villages and fields neere at hand, many of the souldiours were gone abroad forth of the campe. And thus when neither of the Generals were willing thereto, mere chaunce and fortune (which is more powerfull than all the counsell and pollicie of man) made means and gave occasion of a battaile. There was a river not very great, neere to the enemies campe, whereat both Romanes and Macedonians watered: and on either banke side certain guards kept their stations, for the safetie and securitie as well of the one part as the other. Two cohorts there were for the Romanes of Marrucines and Pelignians, footmen; two troupes or cornes besides of Samnite horsemen; all commaunded by M. Sergius Sylus a lieutenant. Over and besides, another standing corps of guard quartered before the camp, containing three cohorts, namely of Firmian, Vestine, and Cremonian footmen, together with two troupes of Placentine and Effermian horsemen, all conducted by lieutenant Cluvius. Now when all was well and quiet about the river, and no side provoked or challenged other; it fortuned that a sumpter horse [of the Romanes] about the fourth houre of the day brake from the hands of those that had the tending and keeping of such, tooke the river & made toward the banke of the farther side: and when three souldiours followed after crosse the water almost knee-deepe to catch him, the Thracians began to traine the jade from the mids of the river to their banke side: but after one of them was slaine, the Romanes recovered the beast againe and retired to their owne guard. Now there was a strong corps of guard of eight hundred Thracians upon the banke which the enemies kept, from whence some fewe at first, taking it to the heart that a countymen of theirs should thus be killed before their face, travelled over the river in pursuit of those that had slaine him; afterwards more and more, and in the end all followed after, and together with that guard leaderth to the battaile. Men were moved with a reverence of the majestie of his place, as he was L. General, also with respect of the honour & glorie of the man otherwise; & above all, with the regard of his age: for that being about threecore yeers old he did undergo the offices and parts of young men in the adventures of greatest travell and daunger. That void space which was between the light targuettiers called Cetrati and the thicke battailons named Phalanges, the legion tooke up cleane, and broke within the battaile of the enemies. Behind the Cetrati was this legion, and had affront them the Pavoisers called Aglaespides, with resplendent or shining shields. L. Attilius who had bene Consull before time was commaunded to lead against the battaillon of other Pavoisers called Leucaspides with white shields. And that was the maine battaile of the enemies. Against the right flanke, from which quarter the skirmish first began about the river, the Elephants were conducted together with a wing of confederate horsemen, and from thence began the Macedonians to flie. For like as many new devises & inventions of men, carrie some shew in apparance of words when they are first spoken of; but come to practise & trie them once, and not to argue and dispute how they should be put in execution, they vanish away without effect and prove just nothing: even so at that time, the Elephants bare a name only in the battaile, without any use and service at all. That violence of the Elephants (such as it was) the Latin allies seconded immediately, and forced the left flanke to recule. Then the second legion was put forth, and in the mids entred upon the Phalanx and put it to flight; neither was there any cause of victorie more evident than this, namely, that many skirmishes there were in divers places, which at the first troubled the Phalanx, and afterwards discomfited it. True it is, that to abide the force thereof it is impossible, so long as it keepeth close united together, and putteth forth their sharp pointed pikes bent thicke couched together breast-high: but if a man by charging the same here and there, force them once to turne about those pikes, which for their length and heave weight are unwieldie & hard to guide, they soone are intangled & catch one within another untowardly: but in case it fall out so, that there be any tumult made either a flanke or behind, then there ensueth a generall trouble and confusion of all, as if they all at once came tumbling downe: like as it happened then, when as against the Romanes, who assailed them by troupes in sundrie parts, they were driven to break their battaillon into many peeces as it were, & so to make head & affront the enemy. But the Romanes espied where there was a breach made & lane left between, and there they would insinuate and wind in with their ranks and files: who, if they had run upon the front of the Phalanx close ranged altogether with their whole battaillon, they had enwrapped and entangled themselves within their pikes: (which in the beginning of the conflict happened to the Peligni as they unadvisedly dealt with the targuettiers called Cetrati) and had never been able to sustaine that battaillon united thicke and couched together. But as there was a cruell carnage committed upon the companies of the infanterie in every place, save only those that flung away their weapons and fled; so the souldiours of the Cavallerie departed in manner safe and sound out of the medley. The K. himselfe was the first man that fled: and now by this time was escaped beyond Pydna, and with his cornets of horsemen which they call, Sacred, made hast to Pella. Anon after followed Cassius and the Cavallerie of the Odrysians: consequently, other troupes and companies of Macedonian horsemen departed and kept their arraies unbroken: for that the Phalanx or battaillon of the footmen between, which kept the conquerors occupied in execution, put them quite out of remembrance to pursue the men of arms. A long time continued the massacre of this Phalanx afront, asanke, and behind. In the end, they who escaped the hands of the enemies, & fled without weapons to the sea; some took the water, & stretching forth their hands to them that were about in the ships, most humbly besought them for to save their lives: and when they saw the small pinnaces and cockbotes making apace on all hands toward them from the ships, they imagining that their comming was to catch them for their prisoners rather than to kill them outright, waded farther into the water, yea and some swummed forward: but when they saw they were by them of the boates slaine in all hostile manner like enemies, as many as could, swam backe againe to land: where they met with a fouler mischiefe, and were worse plagued than before: for the elephants (driven by their governours to the shore) trode them under foot and crushed their guts out. All men generally agreed in this point, That never at any one field, were so many Macedonians defeated and killed by the Romanes: for twentie thousand men were there slaine, and to the number of six thousand (who fled to Pydna out of the battaile) came alive into the enemies hands: five thousand besides were taken prisoners, as they fled scattering and disbanded here and there. Of the victors, there died not above an hundred, and the more part by farre of Pelignians; but a greater number somewhat, were hurt and wounded. And if the battaile had begun sooner, that the winners might have had day enough to follow the chase upon their enemies, all their forces had been utterly defeated and devoured by the sword: but now the night comming upon them, as it covered and shadowed the enemies that fled, so it caused the Romanes not to be so hastie and forward in pursuit; considering they were not acquainted with the coasts of the countrey. Perseus fled to the forrest Pieria by the port rode way, with a great number of horsemen and his roiall traine about him. So soone as he was entred the forest where the way divided into sundrie and divers parts, seeing that the night approached, hee turned out of the high beaten way with very few of his most loyall and faithfull friends. The horsemen being thus abandoned and left destitute of their leader, slipt some one way and some another home into their own cities: certain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Perseus himselfe, because they rode a direct and readie way. The K. was much troubled and vexed untill midnight almost, what with feare and what with difficultie to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Enellus the governour thereof, and the kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and doe him service: but contrariwise, of all those friends who escaped safe out of the battaile and chaunced by variable adventures to come into Pella, there would not one come at him, notwithstanding they were oftentimes sent for. Three onely bare him companie in that flight of his, to wit, Evander of Crete, Neon a Boeotian, and Archidamus the Aetolian. Fearing therefore least they who refused to come unto him, would soone after enterprise some greater matter against him; with those three he fled still forward, about the fourth watch of the night. After him there followed upon five hundred Cretensians. Toward Amphipolis he went; but he departed in the night from Pella, making all the hast hee could to passe over the river Axius before day-light, supposing that the Romanes would give over the chase there, by reason of the difficult and dangerous iour.

The Consull being returned into the camp with victorie, (because he should not have the fruition of sincere and perfect joy) was greatly disquieted and troubled about his younger sonne, and that was P. Scipio, surnamed also afterwards Africanus, because hee raised the citie of Carthage: the naturall sonne he was of the Consull Paulus, and the adopted nephew or grandchild of Africanus: he was at that time seventene yeeres of age, and (which augmented the sorrow of the father) whiles he followed in chase the enemies upon the spur, was carried by the prease a contrarie way, in such sort, as it was late ere he returned: and then the Consull having recovered him againe safe and sound, felt the joy of so great a victorie, and not before.

When the bruit and newes of this battaile was arrived at Amphipolis, and that the dames and

A and wives of the citie ran flocking into the temple of Diana, whom they call Tauropolos, to beseech and call for her aid, Diodorus the chiefe governour of the citie, fearing the Thracians (who were two thousand in garrison) least in that tumult and garboile they would spoile and rife the citie; craftily suborned a fellow for the nones in guise and shew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the mids of the market place: wherein it was written, That the Romane fleet was arrived in Emathia, and that the territories all about were pitifully wasted by them; and therefore the rulers and captains of Emathia requested him to send a garison to succor them against these foraiers. When he had read these counterfeited letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go into Emathia for to guard the coasts thereof: giving them to understand, that considering the Romans were loosely straggling & scattered about the fields and villages, they might make a foule havocke and carnage of them, and besides raise and bring away with them a great bootie: withall, he forgot not to elevate as much as he could, the fame of the foresaid unhappie field fought, saying, That if all had ben true, there would have ben messengers comming thick one after another upon their flight, to bring fresh tidings still therof. Under this pretence he sent away the Thracians; and so soone as hee saw they were passed over the river Strymon, incontinently he shut the gates. The third day after the battaile fought, came Perseus to Amphipolis, and from thence hee sent Orators to Paulus with an herald of peace. Meane while Hippias, Midon, and Pantancus, the kings principall friends, went themselves to the Consull, and surrendered unto the Romanes Berhæa, whither they had retired and fled immediately out of the field. Other cities also stricken with feare one after another, prepared to doe the like.

C The Consull, after he had sent to Rome with tidings and letters of this victorie, Q. Fabius his owne sonne, together with L. Lentulus and Q. Metellus, gave the spoile of the enemies armie thus lying defeated, unto his footmen: but the horsemen hee allowed the bootie of all the territories round about, with condition, that they should not be absent from the camp more than two nights. Then, he removed nerer unto the sea, & lodged about Pydna. First Berhæa (as is before said) yeelded, then Thessalonica and Pella; and consequently, all Macedonie well-neere within two daies was surrendered. But the Pydneans who were next unto him, as yet were behind with sending their embassadours: the reason was, for that the confused confluence thither of many nations, and the disordered multitude of those that fled out of the field, and were all met together, hindered the counsell and consent of the whole cittie: so as the gates were not only shut, but also mured up. Now were Midon and Pantancus sent to parle under the wals with Salon, who lay there with a garison: by whose means the whole troupe and multitude of armed men was sent away, the citie rendred up, and the pillage given to the souldiours.

Perseus, whose onely hope was in the aid of the Bisaltes whom hee had assaied and solicited, and for which purpose he had sent his embassadours (although in vaine) held a publicke assembly, and bringing his sonne Philip with him came forth before the people; to the end that hee might by some exhortation confirme and strengthen the hearts, as well of the Amphipolitans as the companies of foot and horse, who either at all times continually had followed him, or were retired thither by flight for refuge. But ever as he was about to make a speech unto the audience (which he oft began to doe) he could not proceed for tears. Now for that himselfe was not able to speake, he came down from the pulpit, and imparted unto Evander the Cretensian those points, which his will was to be delivered and proposed unto the congregation there assembled. The multitude, as they lamented and wept againe to see the king so piteously shed tears; so they regarded not the speech of Evander: nay some of them were so bold as to crie out aloud from the midst of the assembly, Away, away, and get yee gone from hence, that the small remnant of us here, perish not for your sakes. The stout resolution of these men stopped Evander his mouth, that hee could not say a word and reprie againe. The king by this time was gotten to his lodging, and having conveyed into certaine bottomes upon the river Strymon all his money, gold, and silver, went also in person downe to the water side. The Thracians durst not goe aboard and commit to sea, but slunk every man away to his own home; and so did all the sort of soldiours besides. The Cretensians only (for greedie hope of gain) accompanied the king, who because in sharing and dealing money among them, he should incurre more offence than win thanks, laid out fiftie talents among them upon the river side to skamble for. When they had made quick riddance and a cleane hand with it, they went aboard in a great hurrey so as one barge overcharged ged with a multitude of passengers was cast away and sunk in the mouth of the river. That very day they arrived at Galipfus, and the morrow after at Samothrace, the very place that they intended; and thither (by report) were conveyed two thousand talents. Paulus after he had sent presidents to govern every citie surrendered, to the end that no injurie should be offered in this new peace to the conquered, and detaining with him still the kings heralds and Oratours, not knowing any thing of the kings flight and departure, sent P. Nasica to Amphipolis with a mean regiment of foot and horse, to ruinate and destroy at once Simica, and also to empeach all the desfignements and enterprises of the Romanes.

In this time Melibæa was forced and ransacked by Cn. Octavius; but at Æginium (to the siege whereof Cn. Anicius the Lieutenant was sent) two hundred men were lost by a fallie made out of the towne, for that the Æginians heard not the newes of the late defeature.

The Consull departed from Pydna with his whole armie, and the morrow after came before Pella. Where having encamped within a mile of the citie, he made abode there for certain daies, to view on all sides the situation of the citie, which he perceived and marked full well, to have been chosen not without good cause, for the imperiall seat of the Macedonian kings. Situate it is upon an hill that lieth to the Southwest, enclosed round with meeres, so deepe as they cannot possibly be waded and passed through: and these marshes are bred and fed both winter and summer by waters overflowing out of certaine lakes. Within the very marsh next unto the citie side, there standeth a strong tower by it selfe, bearing up above the rest, as it were an Island raised upon a terrace, made with exceeding labour of mans hand, which terrace both sustaineth a wall, and is not hurt with the moisture of the marsh round about it; and a far off seemeth close joined to the citie wall. Howbeit, divided it is by a river betweene it and the wall, and yet united to the citie by a bridge over it: so as, whosoever assaileth the same without, can have no access any way to it, neither, if the king be disposed to shut and enclose any man within, can hee possibly make an escape and get forth but over the said bridge; which a few men may keep & guard with ease. In this place the kings treasure used to lie, but at that time there was no more found but the 300 talents which were sent to king Gentius first, and afterwards staid and detained. During the time that the Consull remained about Pella in his standing camp, many embassages had audience given them, who repaired thither out of Thessalie, especially to congratulate with him, testifying their owne joy and wishing his. But the Consull after that he had intelligence that Perseus had crossed over to Samothrace, departed from Pella, and at the fourth gift and journey that he made, came to Amphipolis. The whole multitude went forth of the citie in great numbers to meet him, which gave testimonie to every man, that neither a good nor just Perseus was taken prisoner by Emilius Paulus in Samothracia. When Antiochus king of Syria besieged Ptolomæus and Cleopatra, king and queene of Egypt, embassadours were sent from the Senate of Rome, willing Antiochus to give over, and beseege no more an associate king unto them: but when he made answer to this their message delivered, that hee would consider better what he had to doe, Popilius one of the said embassadours, with his rod that he had in his hand drew a circle about the king, and charged him to give him another answer before he went out of that circle: by which rude, rough, and blunt behavior, he forced Antiochus to lay away armes and sword, and so was. Divers embassies of States and kings came with congratulation, and were admitted into the Senat. As for that of the Rhodians, because in the late war they stood out and tooke part against the Romanes, it was excluded. The morrow after, when it was debated in counsell, about making war upon the Rhodians, the embassadours pleaded the cause of their countrey in the Senate: So, they neither had a friendly dispatch and farewell, as allied associates, ne yet were sent away as professed enemies. Macedonie was now reduced into the forme of a province. Emilius Paulus triumphed, notwithstanding the contradiction of his owne souldiours, discontented for that they were pinched and cut short in the pillage, and although Servius Sulpitius Galba interposed himselfe and gainsaid it. Hee led before his chariot Perseus with his three sonnes. And that the joy of this triumph of his should not be entire and accomplished, blisshed sorely it was with the death of his two sonnes: the one died before, the other after the triumph of the father. The Consors tooke a review of the citie, in which were assessed and enrolled in their subsidie bookes 312805 citizens. Prusias king of Bithynia repaired to Rome, to receive with the Senat in their behalfe for the victorie and conquest of Macedonie, where he recommended unto the Senat his sonne Nicomedes. This base minded king, made all of flatterie, named himselfe the enfranchised vassale of the people of Rome.

Virtus Fabius, L. Lentulus, and Q. Metellus, the messengers of the late victorie, albeit they made all the hast that possibly they could, & came speedily to Rome, yet found the joy thereof so have prevented them: for the fourth day after the battaile fought with the king, even as the playes and games were exhibited in the shew-place, there was heard suddenly at first, a confused humming noise, which spread over all the companies of the spectators, That a field was fought in Macedonie and Perseus vanquished: afterwards arose a more cleere and evident voice, which grew at length to an open shout and clapping of hands, as if certaine newes had beene brought of the said victorie. The magistrats wondred hereat, and made search after the author of this so sodaine gladnesse, but none would be found: and then verily it passed away, as the momentanie joy of some vaine and uncertein occurrence: howbeit a joyfull preface of some good luck settled in mens hearts and remained behind. But after that this was confirmed by the true report and relation of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, which they made at their coming, all men rejoiced as well at the fore-giving of their minds, as for the victorie itselfe. This joyous conceit of this assembly in the shew-place, is reported otherwise, and carrieth with it no lesse probabilitie and likelihood of truth, in this manner: Vpon the two and twentieth of September (which was the second day of the solemnitie of Roman games) as the Consull was going up to the lists for to set out the running of the chariots, a post, by report, (who said hee was come out of Macedonie) presented letters unto him decked with lawrell. The Consull then, so soone as he had set on foot the race, presently mounted up into his owne chariot: and as he rode through the shew-place toward the common scaffolds, he shewed unto the people the said laureat letters: which being once seene, the people presently (forgetting all their sports & fights) ran out into the mids of the cirque, and thither the Consull assembled the Senat; unto whom when he had read the letters, by the advise and allowance of the LL. even before the publicke stages and scaffolds, he published the contents thereof to all the people in this manner, That L. Amylius his colleague had fought a set field with king Perseus. That the armie of the Macedonians was discomfited and put to flight, That the king himselfe was fled with some few of his traine, and that all the cities of Macedonie were subdued and brought under the subjection of the people of Rome. These tidings were no sooner heard, but there arose a shout with exceeding great applause, in so much as many men there, left the sight of these disports, and carried these joyfull newes home to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battaile given in Macedonie. The morrow after the Senate assembled in Curia (Hostilia) and ordeined it was, that publicke processions should be solemnized; an Act also passed, that the Consull Amylius should dismiss all those that had taken the militarie oth, excepting onely the sea-fouldiours and mariners; and as for the discharging of those fouldiours, agreed it was, that it should be moved in the Counsell-chamber, when the lieutenants were arrived and come from L. Amylius the Consull, for they had dispatched a courier with letters before them. Now these messengers aforesaid entred the citie the *five and twentieth of September about the second houre of the day, and drew after them a mightie train of those who encountering them upon the way wherefoever they went, accompanied them to Rome, and so directly went to the market-place and tribunall seat. It fortuned that the Senatours sat then in the ordinarie Curia or Counsel-house, and thither the Consull brought the embassadours. Where they were reteined and held so long onely as they might declare these points, How great the kings forces were, as well in foot as horie; how many thousand were slaine, how many taken prisoners; what small losse of Romane fouldiours that great disseaturation of enemies cost; how few they were in number that the king fled with; that it was supposed he would passe into Samothracia; that the fleet was in readines to make way after them in chase; and that it was not possible for him to escape either by land or sea. And then anon they were brought forth before the generall assembly of the people, wherethey made relation of the same. And then the joy was renewed upon proclamation made by the Consull, That all the sacred temples and churches should be set open: & that every man should depart out of the assembly to render thanks unto the gods; in such sort, that all the temples of the gods throughout the whole citie were replenished with mightie multitudes and congregations not of men onely, but also of women. Then the Senate met againe in the ordinarie Curia: and ordeined that publicke processions and thankes should be made for five daies together in all churches and chappels and at every altar, for the happie and fortunate successe of L. Amylius, and that greater head of beasts should be killed for sacrifice. Also that the ships which had readie rigged and well appointed in the river Tyberis to be sent into Macedonie, (in case it had so fallen out, that the king had bene able to have resisted) should be retired and drawne to land, and so laid up drie in their dockes and arsenals: also that the mariners should be called, after the receipt of a whole yeeres pay, and together with all those who had sworn to serve the Consull, should have their conge and pasport to be gone. Item, that all the fouldiours in Corcyra, Brundisium, about the Adriaticke sea, or in the territorie of the Lariates (for in all these there was an armie set in readinesse, wherewith C. Licinius if need required should have succoured his colleague) should have their discharge. Also processions were published in the full assembly of the people, to begin *from the tenth day of October, and so to hold on five daies after.

Out of Illyricum also two lieutenants or messengers, to wit, L. Licinius Nerva and P. Decius, brought word that the armie of the Illyrians was defeated; that king Gentius was taken prisoner, and that all Illyricum was reduced under the obedience of the people of Rome. For which exploits achieved by the leading and conduct of L. Anicius the Pretour, the Senate decreed a solemn procession to be holden for three daies, like as also the Latine feast and holidays were proclaimed by the Consull, for to be holden the *ninth, tenth, and eleventh daies of November.

Some

A Some have recorded that the Rhodian embassadours had not yet their dispatch nor were sent away, but after the newes of this victorie, were called into the Senate in mockerie and scorne of that sortish insolence and pride of their owne. And then Agepolis the principall person of them spake in this manner, That the Rhodians had sent them in deed as embassadours to treat about an accord and to make peace betweene the Romanes and king Perseus, for that this warre as it was greivous and prejudiciall to all Greece, so it could not chuse but bee chargeable and hurtfull to the Romanes themselves. But fallen out it is passing well through the goodnesse of fortune, that the warre is ended otherwise: and hath given them so good an occasion and opportunitie, to rejoyce and testifie their joy in the behalfe of the Romanes, for the achievement of so brave and notable a victorie. Thus much spake the Rhodian. And then the Senat made aunswere againe, That the Rhodians had sent that embassie not regarding the good and profit of Greece, ne yet for any care they had of the expenses defraied by the Romanes, but onely in love and favour of king Perseus. For if they had bene respective unto them (as they would make semblance & have the world to thinke) they should have addressed their embassadours when as Perseus invaded Thessalie with an armie, and for two yeeres space persecuted & plagued the cities of Greece, besieging some, and fighting others with menaces of warre: yet all that while, not a word with the Rhodians as touching peace. But after that they heard once that the Romanes were mounted over the streights and passed through into Macedonie; that king Perseus was shut up and enclosed sure enough for starting any way, then and not before, they could send an embassage, for no other reason in the world, but to rid and deliver Perseus out of that imminent daunger which threatned him so neere hand. With which answer the embassadours were sent away.

About the verie same time M. Marcellus being departed out of his governement in the province of Spaine, after he had forced and woon Marcolica a renowned and famous citie in those parts, brought home with him and bestowed in the publicke treasure ten pound weight of gold, and *about a million of Sesterces in silver coine.

citi.

Paulus Amylius the Consull lying encamped (as is aforesaid) neere Syrae in the Odontian territorie, when hee saw the letters from king Perseus brought unto him by three embassadours of base condition, wept (by report) himselfe, to consider the frailtie of this world, and the sickle state of mans life; to see (I say) that hee who erewhile could not rest content with the roialtie of Macedonie, but would needs warre upon the Dardanians and Illyrians, and levie the aid of the Bastarnians, was now after the losse of his armie, as one exiled out of his owne kingdom, driven into a small Island, where, like a poore suppliant hee remained in suretie, not by means of his owne forces, but through the religious protection of a sanctuarie and priviledged place. But when he red the superscription of the letter with this stile. KING PERSEUS TO THE CONSUL PAULUS, GREETING, he could no more pittie him, for thinking of his blockish follie, in that he had no sence and feeling of the calamitie and miserie wherein he stood. And therefore albeit the contents of the letter otherwise were prayers so demisse and abject, as little favoured of a princely mind, yet was that embassage dismissed without aunswere and without letters. Perseus soone perceived what title it was that hee must lay downe and forget now that hee was vanquished: whereupon he addressed other letters in qualitie of a private person without any other addition at all: and by those as he craved so obtained he likewise, that certain agents should be sent unto him, with whom hee might parley and commune as touching the state and condition of his present fortune. So three delegat embassadours were sent unto him, namely P. Lentulus, A. Posthumius Albinus and A. Antonius. But nothing was effected in this agencie or embassage; whiles Perseus stucke hard and laboured all he could to hold still and keepe the roial name of kings, and Paulus endeavoured contrariwise, that he should submit himselfe and all that he had to the protection & clemencie of the people of Rome. During these debates and affairs betweene them, the fleet of Cn. Octavius was arrived at Samothrace, who also presenting before their eyes fearefull objects of terrour, went about to force him as well by threatnes and menaces, as to win him by hope of faire intreatie & good usage to yeeld & submit; and herein he found some help by means of an occurrent, either hapning by chaunce & meer adventure, or contrived by mans devise of set purpose. L. Atilius a noble young gentleman, perceiving that the people of the Samothracians were met in a generall assembly, requested of the magistrates that he might be permitted to make a short speech unto the people. Good leave he had, and then hee began in this wise.

wise; My masters and friends of Samothracia, I would gladly know, whether it be a false fable or a true tale which we have heard, That this is a sacred lland, and the soile thereof holy and altogether inviolable? When they all accorded in one consent, that the lland was as holy and sacred as it was reported: How is it then (quoth he) that a murder hath violated and polluted it with the blood of king Eumenes? And considering that in all preambles and prefaces of sacred and divine service premised, they are commaunded precisely to avault from the ministerie thereof, who have not pure and innocent hands; will you suffer in deed your most secret sanctuaries and devout tabernacles to be stained with the bloodie bodie of a thiefe and fellow? Now was it a true report & common bruit in every citie of Greece, That K. Eumenes had like to have ben murdered at Delphos by Evander. The Samothracians, besides that they saw their whole lland & the said temple to be in the power and puissance of the Romans, tooke these reproofs and reproches to touch them neer, and not without just cause: wherupon they sent Theondas, the soveraign magistrate (whom they call their K.) unto king Perseus, giving him to understand, That Evander the Cretensian was charged with murder: also that by custom and tradition from their auncestors, they had full power & authoritie to proceed by order of law, against all those that were presented and endited for entering within the liberties and sacred precincts of the temple, with unclean and unpure hands. Now if Evander stand upon his innocencie, and knoweth himselfe cleere and unguiltie of the capitall crime laid to his charge, let him come to his answer and plead his cause for his owne defence, and he shall be heard: but if he dare not hazard the judiciall triall of the issue, retire he and depart, that hee pollute not the temple; let him shift for himselfe and escape away. Perseus called forth Evander unto him, willing him in no case to trie the processe of justice; for neither would his cause justifie him, nor any favour beare him out. Hee much feared withall, least being cast and condemned, he would bewray Perseus himselfe and appeach him for the setter and author of that so horrible a fact: and no way then but one, even with patience and resolution to take his death. Evander gainsaid nought in outward appearance, but pretending in words, that hee had rather die by a cup of poison than upon the sword's point, sought secret meanes to flee and be gone. The king upon advertisement hereof, fearing least the Samothracians would discharge their anger upon him, as if he had wrought his evasion to avoid due punishment, commaunded Evander to be made away and killed. After which murder committed thus rashly without all advisement, hee bethought himselfe and considered, that he should be touched deeply with the same spot of guilt that Evander was noted with: namely, that as Eumenes was by Evander wounded at Delphos, so Evander by him was murdered in Samothracia; and so the two most holy and religious temples in the world were stained and polluted with mans blood; and who but he the cause and contriver thereof? But the blame of this foule fact of his, was by the corruption of Theondas quite averted another way; and he for a summe of money bare the people in hand, that Evander was his owne hangman. But Perseus by this lewd and detestable act, committed upon the person of the onely friend whome hee had alive, (so well approved and tried by him in so many adventures, and now betrayed for his labour by him, unto whome he refused to be a traitour) estranged cleane the hearts and affections of all men from him: so as now every man raunged with the Romanes. Thus abandoned as hee was and left to himselfe, they forced him to cast about and devise how to escape and be gone. Whereupon he called unto him Orosandes the Cretensian, a man that knew well the coasts of Thrace, (because he had negotiated and traded in those parts;) and with him hee dealt to embarke him in some small foist, and so to conduct him unto Corys. Now there was a certain bay under a promontorie of Thrace, wherein a pinnace stood in readinesse: thither, after sun-setting were all things brought for necessarie use; and money withall, as much as closely could be conveyed. The king himselfe at midnight accompanied with three persons (for no more were privie to this his flight) went out at a posierne or backe dore of the house, into a garden neere his bed-chamber, and so with much ado having clambred over a mud wall, passed to the water side. Now was Orosandes already loosed from the foresaid creeke; for so soone as the money was once brought thither into the vessell, hee launched into the deepe and set his course for Candie. Perseus after that the barke was not to be found in the bay, walked and wandered a good while along the strand: and fearing at last the day-light approaching (yet not so hardie as to adventure backe againe to his lodging) lurked behind in one side of the temple close unto a blind corner & coign thereof. Among the Macedonians, they called those the kings pages, who were the princes and noble

A noble mens sonnes, chosen to serve and wait upon the person of the king. That companie yet followed after the K. in his flight, and as hard as the world went, departed not from him until such time as by the commaundement of Cn. Octavius, the publicke cryer pronounced with a loud voice; That the kings pages and all other Macedonians besides in Samothracia, if they would turne to the Romanes, should enjoy with safetie of life their estate entire, their libertie free, and all that ever they either had about them, or was left in Macedonie. At which proclamation once published, they all immediately revolted to the Romanes, and entred their names with C. P. J. Iulius, a martiall colonell. Likewise Ion of Thessalonica, delivered into the hands of Octavius the young infants of the king, and not one of them all was left with Perseus, but Philip his eldest son; and then hee yielded both himselfe and that sonne into the hands of Octavius, crying out upon fortune, and blaming the gods in whose temple they were, for that he received no aid and succour from them, notwithstanding he humbly craved and besought the same. Then commaundement was given, that he should be embarked in the admirals ship: & thither also was brought aboard all the money that remained, and then forthwith the fleet retired to Amphipolis: from whence Octavius sent the king to the campe unto the Consull, but first hee had dispatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was sure enough under his hand, and that hee was at the point to be brought unto him. Paulus, reputed this for a second victorie, (as it was no lesse indeed to be esteemed) presently upon the receipt of the message, killed beasts for sacrifice: and when he had called his counsell about him, & read the letters of the Pretor before them, he sent Quintus Tubera to meet the K. upon the way, and commaunded the rest in good frequence to remaine in his capitall pavillion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there seene before, so great a multitude to runne out for to see any solemne sight or pageant. In their fathers daies king Syphax was taken prisoner and brought into the Romane campe; who besides that there was no comparison betwene him and Perseus, either in regard of his owne name or the renowne of his nation, was then also but an accessarie as it were to the Punick war, like as Gentius now to the Macedonian. Perseus was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandfere onely (whom he neerely touched in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the resplendent glorie of Philip and Alexander the Great, who brought the soveraigne empire and monarchie of the whole world to the Macedonian nation. Well, Perseus entred the campe arrayed in a blacke cloake, without any one of his owne traine to accompanie him, who partaking his miserie, might cause more compassion to be had of him. The affluence of the people was so great who went out to see him, that for the verie prease hee could not march forward, untill such time as the Consull sent his sergeants and huithers to void the thronging of the multitude and make way for him to goe to the Consull his pavillion. The Consull arose, and (giving commaundement to the rest for to sit still) advanced forward a litle, and laught out his hand to the king as hee entred into the pavillion; and when hee bowed and debased himselfe to his verie feet, hee tooke him up againe and would not suffer him ones to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and caused him to sit downe right over-against those whome he called thither to counsell. The first question that hee demaunded of him was this; What wrong hee had sustained at the hands of the people of Rome, that hee should be constrained to enterprise and begin the warre against them with so malicious a mind as hee did, and so to hazard himselfe, his whole state and kingdom, in such extremitie of daunger? And when everie man attended what answer hee would make, hee staid a good while without utterance of one word, casting his eyes wistly upon the ground, and shedding teares withall. Then spake the Consull againe: If you had bene but young (quoth he) when you came to the crowne, I would weily for my part marvaile the lesse, that you should be so ignorant as not to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome either for a friend or an enemy: but now, since you both had your hand in that warre which your father waged against us, and also could not chuse but remember the peace afterwards made with him, and which wee observed most faithfull, What policie was it for you to entertaine warre rather than peace, with them, whose force you had tried in warre and whose fidelitie you had found in peace? When as hee would yet make no answer at all either to question or accusation, the Consull went on and said: Well, howsoever these things are thus fallen out and come to passe, be it through the error and frailtie of man by adventure of fortune and hard happe, or fatall necessitie of the destinies, be it of good cheare yet, and take a mans heart unto you: the gracious clemencie and mercie of the people of Rome, well knowne and proved in the misfortunes of many princes and States, G afford unto you not onely hope, but certaine assurance of safetie. Thus much spake hee to Perseus in the Greeke tongue: then, turning to his owne assistance and companie about him, hee directed his speech to them in Latine as followeth. A notable example and rare mirrour you see (quoth he) of the changeable varietie of this world: to you I speake especially, my maisters here that are fresh and youthfull gallants in the heat of your young blood. And therefore let no man in time of his prosperitie, carrie himselfe proud and violent against another, nor yet confidently to trust upon the present state wherein hee is, for who knoweth what may happen once yet before midnight? But him alone will I hold for a man of valour indeed, whose heart neither the gentle gale of this fawning and flattering world is able to lift aloft, ne yet the blu-sting blasts of frowning fortune cast downe or dash upon the rocks. After the Consull was risen and departed, he committed the charge and custodie of keeping the king to Quintus Ae- H lius. But for that day Perseus was not onely invited courteously to sup with the Consull, but respected also in all kind of honour, as possibly might be done unto him in that state and condition of his.

After this the armie was divided here and there into garrisons for the winter time. The greatest part thereof was received into Amphipolis, and the other cities neere adjoining entertained the rest. This was the end of the warre betweene Perseus and the Romanes, which had endured four yeeres one after another continually: and here an end withall of the most flourishing kingdome of the greatest part of Europe and of all Asia. Perseus was counted the twentieth king after Caranus, who was the first that reigned there. This Perseus began his reigne that yeere when in Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius were Consuls. In the time of M. Junius and A. Manlius Consuls of I Rome, the Senate entituled and honoured him with the name of king, and eleven yeeres his raigne continued. The name of these Macedonians was very obscure and base, untill the daies of Philip the sonne of Amyntas. From that time and by his meanes it began to grow and wax great:
howbeit, contained it was within the compasse and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greece, and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Afterwards it spread into Asia, and in thirteene yeeres space, during the raigne of Alexander, it subdued and brought under subjection, first all those parts whereunto the empire of the Persians extended, which was an infinite dominion in circuit:
afterwards it reached to Arabia & India, even to the end of the earth, bounding & confining all K about upon the red sea. At that time was the monarchie & name of the Macedonians the greatest in the whole world, but upon the death of Alexander, distracted it was and divided into many and sundrie kingdoms. And while each one endeavoured and strove by force to draw unto him more and more puissance, they dismembred and rent the whole: and so from the highest tip and pitch of prosperitie, brought it downe to a most base and low condition, after it had continued in good estate a hundred and fiftie yeeres.

When the bruit of the Romanes victorie was blased and blowne as farre as to Asia, Antenor who with a fleet of barks and pinnaces rid in the harbour of Phanae, sailed from thence to Cassandrea. C. Popilius, who was in Delos to guard and waite those ships which were bound for Macedonie, after he heard say that the warre in Macedonie was brought to an end, and the enemies vessels removed out of their roade, dismissed also for his part the Athenian ships, intending to go L forward in his voiage for Ægypt, to accomplish that embassage which he had taken in hand; to the end that he might encounter Antiochus, before he approached the walls of Alexandria. As these embassadours coasted along the river of Asia, and were arrived at Loryma (a port somewhat more than twentie miles distant from Rhodes, and situate just over against the citie) the principal States of Rhodes, met him in the way (for now by this time was the fame of this victorie flown so far) requesting him to set saile thither & there to land: for that it concerned their citie much in fame & reputation, yea, & was expedient for their good and safetie, that they should be made acquainted with all that either had beene done or was now in hand at Rhodes, & so to make report therof at Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit.
They refused a long time, but in the end they were so importuned, that content they were to saile M a little farther, and spend some small time for to gratifie and benefite a citie associate unto them.
When they were come to Rhodes, the same principall citizens aforesaid urged them instantly with much praier and entreatie to come into their generall assembly of the people. The arrivall of these embassadours rather augmented than empaired the feare of the citie. For Popilius made rehearsall

rehearsall there in open audience, of all which had beene done or spoken (founding any way to hostilitie) either in particular or in generall by them, during the late warre. And being as he was, a grim sir, rough and fierce by nature, hee aggravated all that he spake, with his soure visage and sharpe language, like an accuser at the barre: insomuch as they might well conjecture & guesse, how the whole bodie of the Senate stood affected unto them, by the bitterneffe of one only Sen-atour, who otherwise for himselfe had no occasion of particular ill will and malice against the citie. But the speech of Decimius was more temperate, who said, that the blame of those imputations for the most part which were objected by Popilius, was not to be laid upon the people, but upon a few persons, who had solicited and stirred the multitude: for those having their tongue at hire, and using to speak for gaine, had made decrees full of flatterie to please the king, and sent such embassages, as the Rhodians at all times were no lesse ashamed than repented of: All which practises of theirs no doubt would fall upon their heads who were faultie, in case the people had the government and rule in their owne hands. Audience he had with great assent and applause; not more for elevating the fault and trespasse of the common people, than for laying the weight upon those that were the authours culpable. And therefore when the cheefe men among them made answer to the Romanes, their words, who went about to excuse and save in some sort as well as they could the articles objected by Popilius, were not so wel taken, as their speech who according to Decimius, in delivering the guiltie persons and offenders to bee punished according to their demerites. Whereupon there passed presently a decree, That all those who might bee convicted of any deed done or word spoken in favour of Perseus against the Romanes, should be condemned and have sentence to loose their heads. Some of these persons were departed out of the citie upon the coming of the Romanes, others laid violent hands upon themselves. These embassadours or delegates having sojourned no longer than five daies at Rhodes, departed and made saile for Alexandria. And notwithstanding their absence, the execution of judiciall proceeding was no lesse holily followed at Rhodes, according to the decree made in their presence. For the moderation and gentle cariage of Decimius was the very cause that they persisted resolute, and gave not over untill they had gone through with it, and dispatched all.

Whiles these affaires were thus managed, Antiochus after he had assaied in vaine to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the citie, and having possessed himselfe of all Æ-gypt besides, & left the elder Ptolomeus at Memphis, (for whose behoofe he pretended by his own forces to reconquer the kingdom, to the end that soone after the conquest obtained, he might set upon him likewise) withdrew his armie away into Syria. Ptolomeus for his part was nothing ignorant of his designment and intention, making full account, that whiles he kept his younger brother affrighted with the feare of siege, by the helpe of his sister hee might bee received into Alexandria: considering withall, that his brothers friends were not opposed against him, first hee sent unto his sister, afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and send, before hee had concluded and established a peace with them. The thing that made him to suspect Antiochus was this, for that when he had made over all the rest of Ægypt unto him, hee left yet a strong garison behind at Pelusium: and well he knew, that he held still the frontier towns as the very keies of Ægypt, to the end that he might with an armie enter & invade again, when soever he would. And thus he conceived of it, that this would be the issue of the civile and domesticall warre betweene brethren. That the victour wearied with warre, should not bee able to make head against Antiochus. These things wisely forecast and scene by the elder brother, were received with assent of the younger and those that were assistant about him: and the sister betweene stood in very good stead, not by her good advise and counsell onely, but also by her effectuall praers. And therefore by a generall accord of all, a peace was concluded, and the elder Pto-lomeus received into Alexandria, without any gainesaying or resistance at all so much as of the very multitude; notwithstanding that during the warre they were much decayed and weakened (not only by the siege, but also after it was raised & the armie gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reason that no provisions were brought thither from out of Ægypt. Now, where as Antiochus should have taken great contentment & rejoiced much for this, in case he had brought his forces into Ægypt for to restore Ptolomeus into his own estate (which was the goodly pretence and colourable shew that he made to all the States of Asia and Greece, when hee received their embassages, or sent forth his letters into all parts) so it fell out, that he was so highly offended and displeased hereat, that hee went in hand and prepared to make war now against them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before against one alone. Presently he rigged & sent out his navie at sea to Cyprus; himselfe in person at the beginning of the spring minding to invade Egypt, marched forward with his armie as farre as into C^ele-Syria. The embassadours of Ptolomeus encountered him in his journey about *Rhincolura, and gave him thanks in behalfe of their K. and maister, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdom: requesting withall to mainteine that benefit & good deed of his, to declare rather by word of mouth what he would have done, than deale by sword in hand and force of armes, and not of a friend and allie to become a mortall enemy. His answer was, that he would neither call backe his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unlesse he quit unto his use as wel the whole Isle of Cyprus, as the citie *Pelusium, together with the territorie about the mouth of Nilus, called *Pelusiacum Ostium. And therewith he set him downe a day, before which he expected to receive his answer as touching the accomplishment of the said conditions. After the day prefixed for the truce was past, as they failed in the mouth of Nilus neere Pelusium, the states along the deserts of Arabia yielded. Then, being received of them that inhabite about Memphis, & the rest of the Egyptians, partly with favor & good wil, & partly for feare & constraint, by small journeyes hee descended toward Alexandria. When hee was passed over the river at Leusine (a place about 4 miles distant from Alexandria) the Romane embassadors met him upon the way. After greetings and salutations at their first comming, he put forth his right hand to Popilius; but hee delivered unto him a scroll written, and willed him before hee did any thing else to read that script. After he had red the writing through, he answered that he would devise with his friends & consider what was best to be done. But Popilius according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech which he had by nature, made a circle about the king with the rod that hee had in his hand, and withall, Make me an answer (quoth he) I advise you, such as I may report to the Senate, before you passe the compassse of this circle. The king astonied at this so rude & violent a commandement, after he had staied & paused a while: I will be content (qd. he) to doe whatsoever the Sena shall ordeine. Then and not before, Popilius gave the king his hand as to a friend and allie. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Egypt by the day prefixed, the said Embassadours or delegats having by their authoritie established concord also between the two brethren (who as yet were not thoroughly agreed) some of them failed to Cyprus, and from thence they sent away the fleet of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battaile to the Egyptian ships. This was a noble embassage and much renowned among those nations, for that thereby Egypt was undoubtedly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as possessed thereof already, and the inheritance of the kingdom restored againe to the race of Ptolomeus.

Of the two Consuls that yeece, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victorie, so the other was little or nothing spoken of, by reason he had not matter of any great exploit to be employed in. And first of all when he was assigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entered into the temple without the luckie approbation of the auspices. And when the Augurs were moved & their advise required therein, they declared, that there was an error committed in the appointment of the said day. In his voiage for France he kept his standing leaguer for the summer time about the mountains Sicimina and Papinus nere the plains called *Macri. And afterwards he wintered about the same places with the allies of the Latine nation. For, the Romane legions because the day was not rightly appointed for the assembly of the forces at the Rendus-vant, remained behind at Rome. Also the Pretors, save only C. Pappus Carbo, unto whose lot Sardinia was fallen, went forth into their provinces: & him the LL. of the Senat had ordained to attend upon his civill jurisdiction at Rome between citizens & forreiners (for by lot that charge also hee had.) Popilius likewise, & that embassage which was sent to Antiochus returned to Rome: where he made relation that the controversies betwene the two kings were decided, & the armie of Antiochus retired out of Egypt into Syria. After this came the embassadors also of the kings themselves. Those of Antiochus made report that the king their maister esteemed more of the peace approved by the Senate, than of any victorie whatsoever, and obeyed the orders set downe by the Romane embassadors, no lesse than the very messengers comming with commandements directly from the gods: and finally they testified their owne contentment, and wished them great joy of their victorie obtained, saying that the king himselfe would have bin with all his power at the achieving thereof, in case he had bene enjoined to performe any service. The embassadors of Ptolomeus in the name jointly of their king & of Cleopatra, rendred thanks unto them, acknowledging

A knowing themselves more bounden and beholden to the Senate and people of Rome, than to their owne parents, yea and more than to the immortall gods; for by their good means they were first delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a siege, and had recovered their fathers kingdom, which they were at the point to have lost for ever. The Senate returned this answer againe, That whereas Antiochus had bene ruled and ordered by the embassadours, therein hee did well and as it becomed him, and in so doing he highly contented and pleased the Senat and people of Rome. Againe, if Ptolomeus and Cleopatra the king and queene of Egypt, had found any goodnesse and commoditie by them, the Senate was very glad therfore and rejoiced therat, and would endeavour and worke it so, that they might bee perswaded that the greatest assistance and safeguard of their realme rested at all times most in the faithfull protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretour C. Pappus had in charge to see that presents and gifts were sent to these embassadours according to the auncient custome. Then were letters brought out of Macedonie to redouble the joy of the victorie, importing that Perseus was sure ynough in the hands of the Consull.

When those embassadours were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was betwene the Embassadours of the Pisanes and Lunenses. They of Pisa complained that they were disleized and driven out of their territorie by the Romane coloners: contrariwise those of Luna plainly averred, that the land in controversie had bene set out & assigned for them by the Triumvirs. The Senate hereupon sent five men as commissioners to make inquisition into the limits of the said territorie and to determine accordingly, and those were Q. Fabius Buteo, P. Cornelius Blasio, T. Sempronius Musa, L. Nevius Balbus, & C. Apuleius Saturninus. There came likewise a solemne embassage sent in common from Eumenes, Attalus, and Athenaus, all three brethren, to notify the joy and contentment which they tooke for the Romanes victorie. Moreover L. Manlius the treasurer was readie at Puteoli to receive and welcome Masaniassa the son of king Masaniassa, as hee should disbarke and set a land: for sent hee was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct him also and bring him to Rome at the cities charges. He was no sooner come, but immediately audience was given him in the Senate. This young prince spake in such sort, as the things which of themselves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced & made more worthe of acceptance by his good words. He rehearsed what forces of foot & horse both, how many elephants, what quantitie of corn for that four yeeres space (during the warre) his father had sent over into Macedonie. But two things there were for which hee was discomfited & could not chuse but blush: the one, that the Senat by their embassadors had made request unto him, & not commanded rather to furnish them with necessities for the war: the other, that they had sent them money to pay for their come. For Masaniassa was not forgetfull, but bare well in mind, that he held his kingdom as first conquered for him, afterwards augmented and amplified many waies unto him by the people of Rome: and for his owne part, he could content himselfe with the use and occupation thereof, as a tenant in fee-firme; acknowledging the proprietie and possession thereof to bee in them who as lords of the fee feoffed him therein. Good reason therefore and meet it was that they also should bee bold with their owne, to take and not to aske, to have and not to crave, much lesse then to buy the commodities and fruites yssuing out of the lands by them demised given and graunted. As for Masaniassa, sufficed hee was, and evermore would rest contented with that overplus which the people of Rome might leave & spare for him. Thus much (quoth he) I had in charge and commission from my fathers owne mouth, when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards certain horsemen riding post over-tooke me, to let me understand that Macedonie was subdued; and to charge me, that after I had signified our joy in your behalfe, I should shew unto the Senate, that my father tooke such contentment therein, that he would gladly come to Rome, to offer sacrifice and render thanks to Jup. opt. Max. in the capitoll: which to doe hee requested leave of the Senate, so it might stand with their good liking, and be no trouble unto them. The prince received this answer from the Senat, That his father Masaniassa did as becomed a good man and thankfull person so to doe, in giving such a grace & honor over & above, to benefit of dutie required. Moreover, that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great helpe at his hands in the Punick warre by his valiant and loiall service, as well as he obtained his kingdom through the favour of the people of Rome, yea and afterwards according to equitie and justice, had borne himselfe right worthily in all sort of devoirs and duties during the warres of three kings one after another.

Neither

Neither was it any marvell at all, that he rejoyced at the victorie of the people of Rome, beeing a king who had engaged, hazarded, and entangled all his owne fortunes and the whole estate of his kingdome with the Romane affaires. As for rending thanks to the gods for the victorie of the people of Rome, let him doe that himselfe in his owne house at home; for it should suffice; that his sonne for him performed that dutie at Rome. That hee and his father both had sufficiently for their parts testified their joy. As for Masaniissa, in proper person to leave his realme and depart out of Africke, over and besides that it was in no wise profitable to himselfe, the Se-nat deemed it not expedient for the weale-publique of the people of Rome. Masgaba furthermore requested, that Hanno the sonne of Amilcar should be sent hostage in place of another Carthaginian (whose name is not knowne;) but the Senate answered, That they thought it not meet to demand hostages at the pleasure of Masaniissa. The treasurer was commaunded by order from the Senat, to buy certaine presents for to bestow upon this young prince, namely, as much plate as might arise out of an hundred pound weight of silver: also to accompanie him as faite as Puteoli; to defray all his charges during his abode within Italie; and to hire two ships for to transport and conduct him and his princely traine into Africk. To all his retinue as well bondas free, there was allowance made of apparell.

Not long after, were letters brought as concerning Misagethes the second sonne of Masaniissa, who after that Paulus had vanquished Perseus, was sent home by the said Paulus into Africk with his Cavallerie: but as he failed, was driven (sicke as he was) upon Brundisium with three ships onely, for that the rest of the fleet was disappeared in the Adriaticke sea. Sextinius the treasurer was sent to him at Brundisium, with the like gifts as were bestowed upon his brother at Rome, and a charge to see to his lodging.

By vertue of an act granted out of the Senat, the Libertines [i.e. the sonnes of freed men] were enrolled into the foure tribes of the citie, all save those who had a sonne above five yeeres old; with expresse commaundement, That when they were to be enrolled at the review next ensuing, their goods also should be valued, and they accordingly entred into the subsidie bookes; namely, That as many of them as possessed any manour or manours in the countrey, esteemed better worth than thirtie thousand Sesterces, should be enrolled and assessed. This ordinance being thus observed, Claudius denied flatly, that the Censor had authoritie to take from any particular person, and much lesse from a whole state and degree of men, the right and libertie of suffrages, without the warrant and ordinance of the people: for say, that he have power to caste a man out of his tribe, (which is nothing else but to commaund him to change his tribe) it followeth not then, that he may dispossesse and displace him out of all the five and thirtie tribes, which is much as to strike him out of the number of citizens, and deprive him quite of his freedom and burgesie: and is not (I say) to limit and set down in what raunge he shall be enrolled, but to exclude him full and wholly out of all enrolment. This dispute and debate passed between them; untill at last they grew to this point, that of the foure citie tribes, they should cast lots openly in the hall and cloister of Libertas for one tribe, in which all they should be registred and comprised, who had been villaines sometimes and were enfranchised. Now this lot fell to the tribe Exquilunæ. Then Tib. Gracchus pronounced, That ordained it was to enroll in it all the Libertins.
 Great honour and reputation with the Senat gained the Censors by this act: Sextonius likewise wan much thanks therefore, because hee had persisted constantly in that good enterprise so well commended: and Claudius went not without his due thank, for that he was no hinderance to this proceeding. In this review and survey taken by the Censors, more Senators were remooved and put out of the counceill, yea and more gentlemen commaunded to sell their horses of service, than by other Censors in former time. And all those by both of them joyntly were not only displaced out of their tribes, & made no better than Aerarij (to loose their voice) but also to pay all taxes whatsoever to the utmost. And looke who was noted and disgraced by the one, had no reliefe nor hope to recover his credit and place by the other. Now when these Censors demanded, That according to a custome and order, they might be allowed a yeeres space and two moneths, to looke into the reparations of the publick edifices, that they were maintained wind-tight and water-tight; as also to see whether they who had undertaken to finish certaine works at a price, had performed their bargain accordingly: Cn. Tremellius a Tribune interpoled himselfe and denied this demand, for anger that he was not chosen and taken into the Senat. The same yeere C. Cicerinus dedicated a chappell in the Albane mount, which he had vowed five yeeres before.

* This hath resp. it is not either a tribune or not a tribune.

A before. Also that yeere was L. Posthumius Albinus enstalled a Flamine of Mars. The Consuls
Q. Ælius and M. Junius propounded in the Senat, as touching the government of their provinces: and the LL. ordained, That Spaine should be divided againe into two provinces, which had been united in one during the Macedonian warre: also that the same L. Paulus and L. Anticus should defend and keep in obedience as before, Macedonie and Illyricum, untill such time as they by the advife of certaine depured commissioners, had both composed all matters and affaires disordered and troubled by the warres; and also reformed the estate of that realme, by inducing it into a new forme. The provinces assigned unto the Consuls were Pise and Gaule, and they had the commaund of two legions of footmen, and four hundred horsemen apeece.
 The Pretours had their lots for government as followeth: The civill jurisdiction over citizens fell to Q. Cassius, and over strangers to M. Juvencius Talla: Tib. Claudius Nero was L. depute of Sicilie, Cn. Fulvius of the hither Spaine, and C. Licinius Nerva of the farther: last of all, A. Manlius Torquatus was appointed to the government of Sardinia; but into his province he could not goe, by occasion that hee was detained at home by vertue of an act of the Senat, to make inquisition into certaine felonious and capitall crimes. After this, consultation there was in the Senat as touching the prodigies which were reported. The chappell of the Penates (protectors of the citie) in Velia was smitten with thunder and lightning. Also in the towne Minervium, two gates and a good part of the wall felt the like harme. At Anagnia it had rained earth, and in Lanuvium there appeared in the skie a burning flame. Moreover, M. Valerius a citizen of Rome gave knowledge, that in Calatia within the publicke territorie of that citie, for the space of three dayes and two nights together, bloud gushed out in his chimney hearth where he kept fire: and for this strange sight above all the rest, the Decenvirs were commaunded to have recourse unto the bookes of Sibylla: who proclaimed a publicke supplication of the people for one day, and sacrificed fiftie goats in the common market place of the citie. Also in regard of the other prodigies, a supplication was holden another day, and men did their devotions at everie altar of the gods; greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, and the citie was solemnly cleansed and purged. This done, as touching the honor of the immortall gods, the Senat ordained, that foras-much as the two kings Perseus and Gentius their enemies were overcome, & now at the devotion of the people of Rome, together with Macedonie and Illyricum, Q. Cassius and M. Juvencius the Pretours should give order for as great oblations to be offered unto the gods at every shrine and altar, as had been heretofore (when App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls) for the defeat of king Antiochus. Then they ordained certaine delegates, by whose advife L. Paulus and L. Anticus the two Generals, might set all affaires in order, namely, ten into Macedonie, and five into Illyricum. For Macedonie were nominated A. Posthumius Lufus and C. Claudius (who both had been Censors) C. Licinius Crassus, late companion to Paulus in the Consulship, and who at that present had the government of Gaule continued unto him. To these delegates above-named, men of Consular dignitie all by their calling, were adjoined in commission Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sylla, L. Junius, C. Antistius Labeo, T. Numisius Tarchinensis, and Aulus Terentius Varro. For Illyricum were these named, P. Aelius Ligus, one that had been Consul, C. Cicerinus and Cn. Babius Tamphilus (this Babius had beene Pretour but the former yeere, and E Cicerinus many yeeres past) P. Terentius Tuscovicanus, and P. Manilius. Then the Consuls being advertised by the LL. of the Senat, that (for as much as one of them must succeed C. Licinius in Gaule, who was nominated one of the delegates) they should part their provinces between them either by accord and agreement, or by lot make choice of the fortune of lotterie. So Pise fell to
M. Junius (but before he went into his province, he had in charge to bring into the Senat, those embassies which from all parts were come to Rome for to declare their joy in the behalfe of the people of Rome) and Gaule to Q. Aelius.

Albeit such personages were sent, as by whose sage counsell good hope there was, that the cheefe commanders of the Romane armies would passe no decree unbefitting either the clemencie or majestie of the people of Rome, yet debated it was in the Senat about the summe and F principall points of all their counsels and designes; to the end that the said Legates might carie unto the Generals all things plotted already and begun to their hands at home in the citie. In the first place ordained it was, That the Macedonians and Illyrians remaine free and enjoy their liberties, that all nations of the earth might see, that the drift of the Romane armies and forces was not to bring free states into servitude, but contrariwise to reduce those that were in bondage to

to libertie, to the end that those nations which now enioied freedome, might bee secured under their safeguard and protection both of suretie & of perpetuities, & such as lived in subjection under the kings, might both for the present time find their government more mild and righteous, for that respect which the kings have of the people of Rome; and also, if it fortuneth hereafter that there should be warre betweene the people of Rome and their kings, they might be assured that the issue of those warres would bring victorie to the Romanes, and procure libertie to themselves. Also agreed it was that there should be no more ferming out of the mettall mines in Macedonie, albeit they yeelded a great revenue; nor yet of publick lands & possessions in the country: for possible it was not that these matters should bee practised and followed without publick canes; and where those intermeddle and have ought to doe, then it must needs follow, that either the publicke right and prerogative of the State be annulled, or the libertie of allies come to nothing. Neither were the Macedonians themselves able to exercise the same: for looke where the ministers and managers of any thing see a bootie presented before their eyes, there, occasions of sedition and contention will never be wanting. Moreover, concluded it was, that there should be no common and generall counsell of the whole nation, for teare least at any time the leawd vulgar people having by the Senate libertie graunted unto them tending unto a good and holisome moderation and equalitie of the State, should abuse the same and draw it to a mischievous and pestilent licentiousness. But they thought it good policie to devide Macedonie into four quarters and counties, that each one might have their severall counsell: likewise it was supposed to stand with good reason and equitie, that they should pay the one moitie of that tribute which they were wont to yeeld unto their KK. Semblable commission and like directions they had for Illyricum. As for all other matters, referred they were to the discretion of the Generals and the Delegate commissioners, who might bee better able to devise more certeinly of particulars, according to the occurrents presented unto them in the managing of their affaires.

Among many and fundrie embassadours of kings, nations, and states, Attalus the brother of Eumenes most of all others amused mens minds, and drew their eyes upon him: for by them who had born arms together with him in that war, welcommed he was much more heartily, and received with greater courtesie than if Eumenes the K. himselfe had come. Two occasions there were outwardly pretended, and those carrying a good shew of honestie & credit, which brought him to Rome: the one, a gratulation or testimonie of joy (as meet it was) for that victory, wherein himselfe lent his helping hand; the other, a complaint of French tumultuous warres and the bloudie hostilitie of Adversus their king, by which meanes his brothers kingdome was in great jeopardie. But there lay another thing hidden underneath, namely, an inward and secret hope that he conceived of honours and rewards from the Senat, which hardly he could seeme to aime and reach unto, without some unkindnesse and violence offered to brotherly duty and affection. For some there were even of the Romanes also, who did him no good but gave him bad counsell, drew on his appetite with faire hopes, and set him a longing, feeding him with these and such like conceits. That in Rome this was the opinion entertained of Attalus and Eumenes, as if the one of them were a friend fast and sure to the Romanes; the other an allie, sound and faithful neither to the Romans nor yet to Persus: and therefore hard it were to set downe and say, Whether of the twaine would be more easily obtained at the Senates hands, namely, a suit made in his own name for his preferment, or a demand of some hard course against his brother: so bent were all men in general to grant any thing to Attalus, & to denie every thing to Eumenes. Attalus (as the sequell and prooff sheweth) was sib to those persons whose desires reach at all that hope promise, had not the sage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, ravished and transported so as they were with the amiable aspect and fawning flatterie of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Stratius a physician, sent by Eumenes (who rested not secure of his brothers loialtie) to Rome, of purpose for to lie in cuspial & observe all that Attalus did: and to advise him faithfully, if he saw him tread awrie and practise ought against his dutie and allegiance. When hee came unto him, hee found his cares already possessed, and his spirit tempted and solicited beforehand: howbeit taking his times and waiting opportunities, he went roundly to worke and flucke to it close, untill hee had set all up againe which was at the point to run on end, and fall to the ground. Hee alleadged and laid these remonstrances before his eyes, saying, That kingdomes have growne mightie, some by one meanes, some by others: but as for theirs, being but newly erected, and grounded upon no strength of auncient foundations, it stood

A stood upright only by the mutuall concord of him & his brethren, in that one of them beareth the name and title of king, wearing the diademe & crowne alone upon his head, but in effect all three brethren be KK. As for you Attalus (qd. he) who are the eldest brother save one, who is it that reputeth you for lesse than a king, not only for that he seeth you so mightie at this present, but also for the next heir apparant, & without al doubt like shortly to reign indeed? considering the feeble bodie & crasse age of Eumenes, who hath besides, no issue of children to succeed him in the roiall throne? (for as yet hee tooke no knowledge of him that reigned afterwards.) What need then is there to use violence, & to force that which of the one accord will shortly be devolved upon you and fall into your hands? Moreover a new tempest & storm is risen of French wars, threatening peril unto the realm, which it will be hard for you princes to withstand, agree as well as you can in all brotherly love unitie and concord. But if to forraigne war abroad, there should arise a domesticall and civile dissention betweene you at home, what remedie then, but utter ruine and destruction? Neither shall you (Attalus) purchase any good but this, first to prevent that your brother be not king; & then to disable & disappoint your selfe of that neer & assured hope you have to be K. But say, that to preserve a kingdome for a brother, & to wrest a kingdome from a brother, were honorable and glorious deeds both the one and the other, yet surely, of the twain, to have saved a kingdome deserveth greater commendation and praise, in that it sorteth so well with pietie and kindnesse. And certes, seeing the other is a cursed and detestable part, even next neighbor to parricide; what scruple and doubt remaineth now which needeth any farther deliberation? For tell me, I beseech you, is it one parcell of the kingdome that you reach at, or shoot you at the whole? If you aime at a part onely, then upon the dismembred and distraction of your puissance, you shall bee both twaine much weakened and exposed to the daunger of all injuries: if you would have all, what shall become of your brother? Would you wish him being your elder, to live a private person? or so far stept in yeers as he is, a banished man; and namely with those infirmities of bodie which hee carrieth about him? or would you commaund to take his life away and rid him out this world at once? Now truly to say nothing of the unhappie & miserable issue of such gracelesse and wicked brethren, delivered unto us in fained fables, you see what a goodly fair end Persus is come unto, who being in the temple of Samothracia, was constrained lying prostrate upon the ground; to bafe at the feet of the enimie his conquerour, the crowne and diademe which hee came unjustly by, even with the unnaturall murder of his owne brother: as if the gods in heaven had been there present, to require due punishment for his horrible fact. To conclude, they also themselves, who in no friendly love & affection to you, but in rancour & hatred to your brother Eumenes, have put these designs into your head, & pricke you on to execute the same; even they, I say, will praise your kindnesse, your pietie and constancie, in case you persevere true & trustie to your brother, to the very end. These and such like important persuasions prevailed with Attalus and settled deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senate, after hee had wished joy unto them, and protested his own for the late victorie, hee laid abroad and declared his owne demerites and good service in that war, the favors also (such as they were) done by his brother, and last of all, the revolt of the Gaules, lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His petition to the Senate was, for to send their embassadours unto them, by whose countenance and authoritie they might be reclaimed, and so lay armes aside. Having declared this message which concerned the profit in generall of the realme; hee made a speciall suite for himselfe, and demanded to have Aenus and Maronea given unto him. And thus, when hee had put them besides their hope, who thought verily, that after hee had accused his brother, he would have required the kingdome to be devided peccemcale and dismembred, he departed out of the Counsell house. Seldome had been known at any time before any man whatsoever, king or subiect, to have had the like audience with so great favour and applause of all men, as he: received and entertained he was right honourably with gifts and presents of all sorts whiles he was at Rome, and with the like they accompanied him at his departure.

Among many embassies of Asia and Greece, the Rhodian embassadours were most marked and looked upon throughout all the cite: for whereas at first they were all trim & goodly to be seen in their white & bright apparell, as decent it was for them that would seeme to congratulate for the victorie (for if they had wome black or been poorly arraid, it might have ben construed, that they mourned for the misfortune and calamitie of Persus) after that M. Junius the Consull brake with the LL. of the Senate (and all that while the said embassadours stood without in the common common place Comitium) to consider and advise, whether they would allow lodging, presents, G and give audience in the Senat unto them: they resolved & were of opinion to observe no rights nor customes of hospitalitie with them. Then went the Consull out of the Senate: unto whom when the Rhodians said that they were come to rejoice in their behalfe for the late victorie, and withall, to aunswere in the name of their cittie to certeine crimes wherewith they were charged, requesting that they might speake before the Senate and be heard with indifference: the Consull pronounced aloud unto them, That the custome indeed of the Romanes was, to entreat their allies & friends graciously, & among other matters of courtesie & hospitalitie which they afforded unto them, to graunt them also a day of hearing in the Senate; but the Rhodians had not demeaned themselves during the war, in such sort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers & associates. At the hearing of these words they cast themselves all prostrate on the ground, beseeching H the Consull and all those that were present, not to suffer that false imputations of late furnished should against all reason prejudice the Rhodians more, than their good deserts of old (whereof themselves were sufficient witnesses) stand them in stead. And presently after they had put on simple apparrell and mourning weeds, they went about from house to house visiting the principal persons of the cittie, humbly beseeching them with teares, to heare their cause before they were condemned. M. Iuvenius Taurus the Pretour or L. chiefe justice for the pleas between citizens and straungers, was the onely agent that provoked and incited the people against the Rhodians: nay he had promulged and published a bill to this effect, That warre might bee denounced against the Rhodians; also, that out of the magistrates for that yeere they would make choise of some one to bee sent as Admirall with a fleet for the manning of that warre: hoping that I himselfe should be the man. But this action and proceeding of his was crossed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribunes of the commons. Over and besides, the Pretour, to say a truth, had broached this matter after a new and strange fashion, & to the evill example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his owne head alone, without asking the advise of the Senate, or making the Consuls acquainted therewith: and that in this manner and forme, Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that warre be proclaimed against the Rhodians? whereas alwaies before-time, in question of warre, the Senats advise was first taken, and then the thing was proposed unto the people. Likewise the Tribunes of the commons for their part, did more than they might, and a thing not warrantable by any precedent. For it was a custome & tradition observed ever of old, that no person should interpose his negative to crosse any bill, before that K private men in particular had their course and turne graunted, both to perswade or dissuade the same: by which meanes many a time it fell out, that even they who never professed nor meant to oppose themselves, being mooved and induced by the reasons of those that stood up to dissuade, and perceiving also by them the inconveniences of such a bill, would step betwene and dashall: yea and contrariwise such as came of purpose to crosse and nip the same, being convinced by the L authority and borne downe by the important arguments alleadged by those that enforced the said bill, would desist and surcease. Thus the Pretours and Tribunes strove a vie who should doe every thing more unreasonably than others. The Tribunes impeached and staid the hastines of the Pretour, interposing their negative before the time, and deferring the matter untill the coming of the L. Generall.

* The beginning of this Oration of the Rhodians to the LL. of the Senate is lost.

Whither we have transgressed and offended yea or no, that yet remaineth doubtfull: but sure we are of this, that we suffer all punishments and shamefull ignominies already that can be devised. Heretofore, when the Carthaginians were vanquished, when Philip, when Antiochus was overthrowne, wee came to Rome: from our publicke lodging provided for us at the charges of the "cittie, wee presented our selves (my LL.) into your Counsel-house, to testifie our great contentment for your conquests: from the Counsel-house we went directly to the capitoll, carrying with "us presents and oblations to the honour of your gods. But now we the same Rhodians are come "unto your Senat clothed in this poor habit and array, as you see, from out of a base hostellie and "common inne, where hardly we could have lodging for our money; being commanded in man- "ner of enemies to make our abode without the citie walls; we Rhodians (I say) whom but lately ye "feasted with the graunt of two provinces, Lycia and Cyria, & whom ye graced with all kind of ho- "nours, and enriched with all manner of gifts and rewards. You ordaine as wee here say, that the "Macedonians and Illyrians should live free, notwithstanding they were in servitude before they "levied warre against you. Neither speake wee this in envie and repine for any mans welfare and good

A good estate; nay wee acknowledge therein the rare clemencie of the people of Rome:) and "will yee then make the Rhodians of friends, enemies, who during this warre did no more but sit "and meddle with neither part? Now surely yee Romanes are the men that pretend and give out "ordinarily, that your warres have good successe and speed well, because they be just and righte- "ous: neither do you glorie so much in the event and yssue thereof, whereby ye are revengers and "conquerours, as for the beginning and first enterprises, in that yee undertake them not without "good cause. The besieging of Messana in Sicilie by the Carthaginians, was the cause that the "people of Rome reputed them enemies. The assailing of Athens by Philip, his intent and pur- "pose to bring Greece into servitude, his relieving of Anniball with men and money, caused him "likewise to be holden for their enemy. Thus Antiochus brought upon his owne head the Roman "warre, for that he being sollicit by the Aetolians your enemies came willingly out of Asia, and "with a fleet sailed over to Greece: and when hee had seized upon Demetrias, Chalcis, and the "streights of Thermopylae, went about to dispossesse you of the empire. And last of all, Perseus "by levying armes against your allies, by killing some of their petickings and princes, by mur- "dering other chiefe personages of sundrie nations and citties, gave you just occasion to make "warre upon him. But what colourable cause can there be pretended of our calamitie, if needs we "must miscarrie and perish? All this while I make no difference between our citties case and that "of Polyaratus and Dion our citizens, even those persons whom we have brought to deliver into "your hand. For suppose that the cause were all one; and that wee Rhodians were all faultie and "culpable alike, what might that crime be for which we are touched in this warre? We favoured "C Perseus and that side (you will say) and like as in the warre of Antiochus and Philip, wee stood with "you against those things, so now we tooke part with the K. against you. Was that all? well. In what "sort we are wont to aid our associates, and how lustily to enterprise warres, do but aske of C. Livius "and L. Aemilius Regillus, the Admirals of your fleets in Asia. Your ships never fought at sea "without us; yet we with our own Armada alone fought a battaile once before Samos, & a second "time in Pamphylia against Generall Anniball: which victorie they shieved was unto us by so "much more honourable and glorious, for that after we had in an unfortunate fight nere Samos "lost many of our ships and the very choise and floure of our youth, we nothing terrified and dis- "maied with so great an overthrow, durst turne againe to make head, yea and were so hardie as to "encounter the kinges roiall navie coming out of Syria. And all this have I related not by way "D of boast and to glorifie our selves (for we are not now in case to stand upon those rearmes) but to "give you a ~~rest~~ by the way and put you in mind, in what maner the Rhodians have used evermore "to succour their confederats. And for the better prooffe therof, after the defeaure, of Philip and "Antiochus we received at your hands right great rewards & recompence for our service. In case "the fortune of Perseus had bene so happie as yours is at this present (praised be the gods for their "grace and goodnes, and thanked be your owne valour withall) & we had come into Macedonie "to the king upon his victorie to require and demaund rewards, what could we alleadge therfore? "Might we say that he had bin maintained by our mony, or relieved with our cornes with land for- "ces, or strength at sea? Was there any place by us kept and held with a garison for his use? were we "able to tell where we fought, either under the conduct of his captaines or upon our own leading "E and direction? If haply he should demand in what quarters our souldiours kept? in what coast our "ships lay in guard for his defence, what could we answer? Peradventure we might plead our cause "and excuse our selves in the presence of him, supposed conquerour, like as we now do before you "here in place. For by sending our embassadors to & fro unto you as well as to him about a treatie "of peace, this is all the good we have gotten, that in stead of winning the love and favour of both "parts, we incur the heave displeasure of the one; being thus charged with crimes and wrapped "in dangers. And yet my good LL. and honourable Senatours of Rome, Perseus might truly ob- "ject that to us, which you in no wise can, namely, that wee in the beginning of the warre sent em- "bassadours to you making promise in our name of whatsoever was needfull therunto also that "we would be readie at all assaies to furnish you with ships strongly rigged, and with our youth wel "F appointed, like as in the wars aforetime. That we performed not these promises of ours, you only "were the let & hinderance, who (whatsoever the cause was) refused our offered service, & rejected "all our succours. Well then, neither have we attempted ought as enemies, nor failed in the dutie "of good friends & allies: but impeached have we bin by you for effecting that which we intended. "How now? may some man say: Hath there been nothing done or said in your cittie (O yee Rhodians) dians) that you wish unsaid or undone, and whereat the people of Rome may justly take exceptions and be offended with you for it? Vndertake to iustifie and make good whatsoever hath ben done, I will not, neither have I so little wit I trow; but fever I will the publick cause of the whole state, from the privar offences committed by particular persons: for no citie is there under the sunne, but may otherwhiles have lewd and naughtie citizens some or other, and evermore a rude and forthin multitude. I have heard say, that even amongst you here at Rome, some have sought to advance and set themselves aloft by currying favor and flattering the common people; and that the time was, when the commons rose and departed from among you, so as the rule of the common-weale and people of Rome was out of your hands, as in a verie Anarchie. If such a thing as this might chaunce in this your citie (so well qualified and ordered as it is) how can any man make a wonder, that among us there have been some, who (affecting and seeking for the amitie and friendship of the king) might haply corrupt and seduce our commons with their naughtie counsell? And yet when all is said, they prevailed no more than thus; that we fate still and failed in doing our devoir to you: for I will not over-passe in this place the greatest and most grievous crime of all other wherewith our citie is charged during this war, and that is this, At one and the same time wee sent embassadours both to you and Perseus about a peace. This designment so untoward and unluckie as it was, a furious and brainicke oratour and flagent of ours (as afterwards wee understood) handled as foolishly: who (as it is for certain knowne) framed his language in that manner, as if he had ben C. Popilius the Romane embassadour, whom yee sent to the two KK. Antiochus and Ptolameus, to warne them both to lay downe armes and forswear war. But that behaviour of his, (call it what you will, either pride or follie) was no worse before you than it was to K. Perseus. Every citie hath their conditions and qualities by themselves, like as particular and severall persons: and semblably it is in whole nations; some are te- tie and chollericke, bold and audacious; others againe be fearfull and timorous: some are given to wine and drunkenness, others to women and wantonness. The people of Athens (by report) are too hasty, hore, and forward to enterprise any thing even beyond their power. The Lacedaemonians againe, be as slow and backward, casting many doubts and difficulties to enter upon the very things which they are assured of. I cannot denie, but that all the country of Asia in general breedeth many a mad braine and vaine spirit: and I will not say, but that our people are jolly fellows of their tongue and can speake bigge, for that wee seeme (among other cities and states bordering upon us) to excell and surpasse; and that not so much in the confidence wee have of our owne forces, as for the honourable regard ye have had of us, and the great testimonies and judgements yee have given out, of us. But that foolish embassage of ours even then at the very time had punishment sufficient, being sent away (as it was) with so heave an answer of yours: and if we were not then disgraced and shamed enough, now surely this present embassage so humble and pitifull, were able to make full satisfaction for a more insolent embassage than it was. All pride (and arrogancie of words especially) chollericke persons indeed hate, wise men deride, and namely from an inferior to his better; but no man ever judged it a mortall sinne and worthe of death: mary here was all the daunger, least haply the Rhodians might seeme thereby to despise the Romans. How then? be there not some also that cannot rule their tongue, but will be railing and uttering blasphemous words against the gods; yet we never heard of any that have been therfore smitten dead with a thunderbolt. What remaineth then for us wherein we should charge and cleere our selves, if we neither can be charged in fact with hostilitie; and if our embassadour hath used some proud and presumptuous words more than became him, which deserve not the totall ruine of our citie, but some sharpe checkes and hard rebukes on both sides of our eares? But I heare (my good LL.) that in your ordinarie talke among your selves when yee are together, we are censured for our inward affection only, and secret thoughts, and condemned no lesse than for some deed, namely, That in heart we favoured the king, and wished him rather than you to obtaine the victorie; and therefore they deeme us worthy to be persecuted with fire and sword. Some there be againe of you, who thinke verily that thus indeed we stood affected, howbeit they would not have us for it to be warred upon as enemies; for that it standeth not with the custome or law of any citie in the world, That if a man with a mischief to his enemy, hee should be straightwaies condemned therefore to die, so long as he hath not entred into any action tending thereto. And verily these men wee have to thanke, who free and quit us yet from punishment, although they cleere us not of guilt: howbeit this sentence we passe against our own selves,

A selves, That if it can be proved, that we were all of us so minded and disposed in affection as we are burdened, (for content we are that all goe under one, heart and hand, will and deed, without distinction) then let us all be punished for it and feele the smart. But if of the great men and chiefe among us, some affected you, and others the king; wee require not, that for the love of us who sided with you, the kings supports should fare the better and escape cleere; but we request and beseech rather, that for their sakes we perish not and be quite undone. And certes, your own selves are not worse affected and more set against them, than our very citie is: which they knowing wel enough, most of them either fled away, or els killed themselves: others of them (such as we have condemned and passed judgement against) shall bee at your pleasure (my LL.) to doe with them what you will. All the rest of us Rhodians, as thanks wee have merited none in this warre, so we have deserved as little punishment. Lay the over-deale and surplussage of our former good deeds and demerits to this want of dutie now, and let the heape of the one make up the scant measure of the other. With three kings of late yeeres yee have maintained warre; let not our slackness and sitting still in this one, endamage and hurt us more, than our devoir and employment in the other twaine may seeme to satisfie and countervail. Set Philip, Antiochus, and Perseus, for three verdicts and sentences as it were passed upon us: two of them acquit us cleere; the third is doubtfull whether it will goe against us or no. In deed if they themselves were to sit upon us, we should no doubt be cast and condemned: but you (my good LL.) that are our competent judges, determine now at once, Whether there shall be a citie of Rhodes remaining upon the face of the earth, or be rased utterly and destroyed from the very foundation for ever: for you are not to debate in counsell about making warre upon us: which well you may begin and goe in hand with at your pleasure; but follow and manage you never shall, because there is not a Rhodian that will take armes and come into the field against you. Will you not be pacified but persist still in your choller and anger? then will wee crave at your hands some respite of time, whiles we may go home & report there how we have sped in this lamentable embassage of ours. And then, all of us in Rhodes franke-borne and of free condition, every one, I say, man and woman, with all our havoir and substance will embarke our selves: forsake wee will our privat houses and publicke edifices; and to Rome straight will we all come: and when we have laid on heaps here in your common hall, and at the porch and entrie of your counsell-house, whatsoever gold and silver we have either in privat purse or common chist: commit we will to your devotion and mercie our owne persons, together with the bodies of our wives and children; and never will we goe further, but even here in this place will we suffer and abide that, which wee have to undergoe and endure. Let our citie then be sacked, rifled and burned, so it be farre enough out of our eye that wee see it not. The Romans may (if it please them) judge the Rhodians enemies; yet you will give us leave to passe in some sort a doome of our owne, That we in our consciences never condemned our selves for such, nor ever will enter in any hostile action against you, come what will, even the utmost extremitie that can bee suffered. After their oration in this manner uttered, they fell downe againe all prostrate, and as humble suppliants cistoones put soorth and shook their branches of the olive, untill at length they were raised up on their feet, and so departed out of the Senat. Then began the LL. within, to give their opinions and passe their sentences of them. The heaviest enemies and most maliciously bent against the Rhodians, were those, who had conducted the warre of Macedonie, as Consuls, Pretours, or lieutenants: but M. Porcius Cato was their only patron that stood to them and supported their cause right earnestly; a man otherwise by nature sower and severe, but as then hee shewed himselfe a mild and gracious Senator. I will not insert here the lively portraiture and resemblance of that edipious and eloquent person, by relating the flowing speech which hee then delivered: his very oration is extant in writing, and contained in the fifth booke of his Origines. In fine, the Rhodians received such an answer, as they neither were concluded enemies, nor yet remained in the nature and qualitie of friends. The principall persons of this their embassage, were Philocrates and Asymedes. Ordered it was and agreed betweene them, That Philocrates (with some of his fellows) should report this answer at Rhodes; and that Asymedes (with the rest) should stay behind at Rome, to know what was practised and done there, and give intelligence thereof accordingly to their citizens at home. For that present, the LL. of the Senate gave them in charge, to remoove their captaines and governours by a certaine day out of Lycia and Caria. These news related at Rhodes, importing matter (in it selfe considered) of greeke and heaviness, turned into joy, in regard that they were eased from the fear of a greater mischief, for they doubted fore that they should have had more warre. And therefore presently they ordained for the Romanes a crowne amounting to the value of twentie thousand peeces of gold, and with this present they sent Theodorus the Admirall of their navie in embassage. A will and desire they had to make suit unto the Romans for association: but so, as no act and ordinance of the people should be entred thereof, nor any instrument engrossed as touching it. And this they did, to avoid the greater shame and ignominie of repulse, if haply they missed of their purpose, and could not obtaine. The Admirall alone had this priviledge, and was permitted to treat of that matter, without any bill at all either published or enacted by the people. For in so many yeeres before they had continued in amitie with the Romanes in such sort, as they never linked and tied themselves unto them by any formall deed and covenant upon record, and that for no other reason in the world, but because they would neither cut the kings off from all hope of their aid, if haply any of them might stand in such need, nor disable themselves of the possibilitie they had to reape some fruit, and receive good of their bountie and prosperitie. But surely at this time (mee thinkes) they ought to have fought sadly and in good earnest for their societie, not so much for safetie and securitie against others (for none they feared at all but only the Romans) as to be rid of the suspition and jealousie which the Romanes had of them. About the same time the Caunians also revolted from them, and they of Mylasia tooke certaine townes of the Euromestians. Now were the hearts of these Rhodians within the citie not so much broken or abated, but they saw wel ynough that if the Romanes tooke from them Lycia and Caria, all the rest would either by way of revolt put themselves in libertie and shake off the yoke of their subjection, or els bee surprisid and seized by the neighbour nations bordering upon them: and that then they should bee pent up and shut within the compasse of a small Isle and the stronds of a barren soile, not able to nourish and maintaine the inhabitants of so great and populous a citie. Therefore with all speed they dispatched and sent forth their youth, & not onely forced the Caunians (notwithstanding they had joined unto them the aid of the Cybirates) to their obeisance, but also in battell neere Onhosia overcome, the Mylasseans and Alabandians, who having disfeized the Euronensians of their province, advanced jointly with their united armies against them.

Whiles these affaires thus passed there, whiles some occurrents fell out in Macedonie, and others likewise at Rome, L. Anicius having subdued king Gentius (as is before said) and brought him under his owne hand, placed a garrison in Scodra, the kings roiall seat, and appointed Gabinus the captaine thereof: but in Rhizon and Olcinia, two commodious cities of good importance, he ordained C. Licinius the governour. Having thus made over the rule of Illyricum unto these twaine, himselfe with the rest of the armie went into Epirus. Where the towne Phanota was the first that yeelded unto him, and the whole multitude of the people came forth to meet him with their insules in token of submission. After he had put a garrison in this peece also, he passed over into the countrey of Molossis, where he received the surrender of all the townes thereof, excepting Passaron, Tegmon, Phylacum, and Horreum. And then hee led his armie first against Passacon. The principall men and rulers of that citie were Antinous and Theodorus, men of marke and name, as well for the favour they bare to Perseus, as the hatred they caried to the Romanes: the onely persons who had counsellid and perswaded the whole nation to revolt from the Romanes. These two having guiltie consciences within them for their private trespasses, and being past all hope of finding any grace and pardon, shut the gates of the citie, to the end that they might perish with the overthrow of all, and bee overwhelmed with the totall ruine of their owne countrey: and therewith they exhorted the multitude to preferre present death before servitude and slavery. No man durst once open his mouth to contradict these so great and mightie persons. At length a certaine noble young gentleman, named also Theodorus, with whom the greater dread from the Romans abroad prevailed more, and overcame the lesse feare of the rulers at home. What aile yee my maisters (quoth he) and fellow citizens, what rage and madnesse haun-
 33 teth you, to enwrap and interesse the whole citie in the fault and follie of these two persons? Cer-
 33 tes, I have often heard of men that for their countrey have willingly lost their lives, but to thinke
 33 it meet, that their countrey should perish for them, these are the first that ever were known. Why 33 rather open wee not our gates and submit our selves to that empire, into which the whole world 33 besides is subject. As he spake these words, the multitude followed him toward the gates: which when Antinous and Theodorus saw, they made no more adoe, but brake upon the first corps de guard

A guard of the enemies which they came unto, & exposing their bodies to the swords point, were soone killed, and the towne was yeelded into the hands of the Romanes. Tegmon also, upon the like wilfull obstinacie of prince Cephalo, had shut their gates, but after that he was slain, the town was taken by surrender. And neither Phylace nor Horreum would abide the assault. Having thus quieted Epirus, and bestowed his forces by garrisons in diverse commodious townes for the winter time, he returned into Illyricum: where hee held a generall assembly at Scodra, to which hee had summoned the principall States of the whole nation, and whether also there were arrived five delegates from Rome. And there in this frequent and solemne session, he pronounced from the Tribunall seat, by the advise of the counsell assistant unto him, That the Senat and people of Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy libertie, and that himselfe would withdraw the garrisons out of their towns, fortresses, and castles. As for the Iffceans, Taulantians, Tirustians in the Dalfaretians countrey, Rhizonites and Olcianates (for that whiles Gentius his fortune stood upright, they had raunged with the Romanes) hee declared them not onely free, but also exempt and priviledged from all tributes. The Doarsians also, for leaving Caravantius, and passing with their armies to side with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunitie. They of Scodra, Dafsara, and Selepita, with the rest of the Illyrians, were to pay the one moiety of the tribute which they had yeelded to the king. After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons: the one of them he made of those before named: the second, all the Labeates: and the third, of the Agravonites, Rhezonites, Olcinates, and those that bound and border upon them. Having set downe this order in Illyricum, hee returned to Passaro a citie in Epirus, there to lie for the winter time.

C Whiles these things happened in Illyricum, Paulus before the coming of the ten Legates, sent Q. Maximus his sonne (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the laccage of Aegium and Agassae. The quarrell against Agassae, was, for that they having delivered the towne once to Marius the Consul, and therewith of their owne accord craved the alliance of the people of Rome, revolted notwithstanding afterwards to Perseus. As for the Aeginians, they had committed a late and fresh trespass: for giving no credite to the same that was voiced of the Romans victorie, they cruelly handled certaine Romane souldiours, who were entred into their citie. Moreover, hee sent L. Posthumus likewise to ranfacke in hostile manner the citie of the Aenians, for that they had persisted in armes more lustily than the other neighbour cities. Now was it about that season of the yeere which men call Autumne: in the beginning whereof, so soone as he had determined to ride a circuite and visite all Greece round, and to see those places whereof there went to great a name, and which were more renowned by hearesay than known by sight of eie; hee left C. Sulpitius Gallus for the commaund and guard of the campe, and set forward in his progresse, accompanied with no great traine. And being guarded of the one hand with his owne son Scipio, and on the other, with Athenaus the brother of king Eumenes, hee passed through Thessalie, toward the famous Oracle at Delphos. Vher, after he had sacrificed to Apollo, hee destined and appointed those Columnes and pillars (which were begun in the porch of that temple, and whereupon the statues of king Perseus should have ben erected) for to sustain and bear the statues of himselfe with the title Victorious. Hee visited also the temple of Iupiter Trophon in Lebadaia: where, after hee had seene the mouth of that peakish cave into which they use to descend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, & know the wil of the gods; after sacrifice also done to Iupiter & Hercinna, whose temple there is to be seen, he went down to Chalcis, to behold the frith of Euripus, and that Island which in times past was united and joined to the firme continent by a bridge. From Chalcis hee crossed over to Aulis three miles distant from thence, a port enabled for the rode sometime there of Agamemmons fleet, consisting of a thousand saile. Being there, hee went to the temple of Diana, where that king of kings (Agamemnon) offered his owne daughter in sacrifice upon her altar, to have a prosperous voiage for his fleet extending to saile to Troy. After this he came to Oropus, a towne in Attica, where as Amphilochus the Prophet is worshipped as a god. There, was to be seene an auncient temple, most pleasant to behold for the goodly fountaines and rivers round about it. Then went hee forward to Athens, a citie likewise for antiquitie of fame much spoken of, and highly renowned time out of mind: wherein were many monuments also worth the seeing: namely the citadell, the havens, the wals that reach from the citie to Pyreum, the arsenals made by great captaines and commaunders, the images of the gods, and of men likewise, so rare and excellent, as well for the artificiall workmanship, as the matter

whereof they were made. When he had sacrificed within the citie to Minerva the goddesse & patronesse of the said citadell, he kept on his journey, & the next day following arrived at Corinth. A faire and beautifull citie this was in those daies, before it was destroyed, the fortress there and the Isthmus were things of especiall marke and worth the sight for the said fortress notwithstanding it be mounted up to an exceeding height above all, yet is it full of fountaines; and the Isthmus by a narrow ridge of land divideth two seas neere together, the one lying East and the other West. From thence he went to Sicyon and Argos, two noble cities, and so forward to Epidaurus, nothing in wealth comparable to the rest, yet of great name for the famous temple of Aesculapius, which standeth five miles from the citie, where at this day are to be seen the marks and tokens of the emptie places from whence the oblations have bene plucked away: but then a rich place it was and full of those offerings and gifts, which diseased persons had consecrated to that god in recompence & reward for those soveraigne salves & wholesom remedies which they there found. From thence he came to Lacedæmon, a citie memorable not for any magnificence of stately workes and buildings, but for good discipline and orders there observed. From whence passing through Megalopolis, hee ascended up to Olympia: where among other things there to be seene, he beheld Iupiter as it were represented even before his eyes, whereat hee was much moved in spirit. And therefore as if he had bene to sacrifice in the capitol, he commaunded a sacrifice to be prepared with more state and magnificence than ordinarie. Thus having visited all Greece over without any searce and enquire made, how men either in generall or particular stood affected in the warre against Perseus, (because he would not trouble and disquiet the minds of the allies with any fearfull occurrence) as he returned toward Demetrius, he was encountered by the way with a number of Ætolians all clad in dolefull and mourning array. And when he wondered and asked what the matter might be, he was given to understand that five hundred and fiftie of their principall men of name, were by Lyciscus and Tisippus massacred, who with the helpe of certaine Romane souldiours sent from Babius the governour, had beset their Senate: that the rest were driven into exile; and the goods as well of those who were murdered, as also of the banished persons were now possessed by their accusers. He commaunded them to attend upon him at Amphipolis, and when himselfe had communed and conferred at Demetrius with Cn. Octavius, after he once heard that the ten legates had passed the seas, he laid aside all other affaires, and went directly to Apollonia there to meet with them. To which place when Perseus came to meet him, for he having over-large libertie of prison, was come from Amphipolis, & that was a daies journey off; unto the K. he shewed good countenance & gave him good & gracious words, but after he was returned to the camp at Amphipolis, he sharply checked and rebuked, as men say, C. Sulpicius, first for suffering Perseus to range so loosely and so far off from him, all over the province: secondly, for giving his souldiours so much libertie as to plucke the tiles from off the wals [and houses] of the citie, to cover the places of their winter harbour: and therewith he commaunded that the tiles should be carried thither againe where they had them, and the houses to be repaired as sufficiently as before. As for Perseus & his elder sonne Philip, he delivered unto A. Posthumius to be kept in safe custodie: but his daughter and younger sonne, he sent for to Amphipolis from Samothrace, and used them with all courtesie and kind intertainment as possibly hee could. When the day was come, on which hee appointed that ten principall burgeoises out of every citie should repaire to Amphipolis, and that all the kings letters & writings in what place soever to be found, should be fought up and represented there together with all his money; hee sat him down upon the tribunal seat, together with the ten legats from Rome, & the whole multitude of the Macedonians were gathered round about him. Albeit they had bene used to subjection under the king, yet this new Tribunall carried with it a forme and shew of a terrible government, namely when they saw the tipstaves and huishers to keepe the doores and places of entrie, the publicke crier and the sergeant: straunge matters all unto their eyes and eares, and whereto they had not bene accustomed, able to strike a terror to allies, much more then, to conquered enemies. After silence made by the crier, Paulus pronounced in the Latine tongue, what the Senates pleasure was to be done, and what himselfe with the advise of his Councell assistant about him had thought upon and set downe: all which points Cn. Octavius the Pretour (for hee also was in place) interpreted and related againe in the Greeke language. Imprimis, they ordeined the Lacedæmonians to be free, to have and enjoy the same cities and territories, to use and exercise their owne lawes, to create yeerely magistrats, and to pay halfe of that tribute to the people

A people of Rome, which they used to pay unto their kings. Item, to divide Macedonie into 4 quarters; The one, & that the principall, for to containe all the countrie between the two rivers Strymon & Nessus; to which part there should be laid the tract on the farther side of the river Nessus Eastward (where Perseus held townes, castles and cities) excepting Ænus, Maronea, and Abdera: also beyond Strymon Westward, all the Bisaltique territory, together with Heraclea, which they call Syntice. For the second, all those parts which on the East side the river Strymon encloseth, except Syntice, Heraclea, & the Bisaltæ: also on the West, whatsoever is bounded with the river Axios, together with the Pæonians lying to it, who inhabite upon the river Axios Eastward. The third quarter was that, which Axios from the east & Peneus the river from the west do compass; and to the North side is limited with the mountaine Bora, and to this portion was adjoined the tract of Pæonia, which coasteth along the river Axios toward the West: Edeffa also & Berthæa were annexed thereto. The fourth was beyond the mountain Bora, confining on the one side upon Illyricum, & on the other upon Epirus. The head cities of every quarter where they should hold their sessions and counsailes he appointed these: For the first, Amphypolis; Thessalonica for the second; In the third Pella; & Pelagonia in the fourth. To these places hee ordeined that by summons they should repaire, & hold the assemblies of ech quarter; thither the mony to be brought, and there the magistrats to be created. Item, he declared and pronounced that it should not be lawful for any person to contract marriage, neither to have commerce & traffick together in buying or selling of lands or tenements without the limits of their owne division. Item, that in their mines they should no more dig for silver and gold: but for Iron and brasse they had permission. And those that had the profit thereof, were to pay the one half of the old rent, which they were wont to yeeld and grant unto the king. Item, he forbade them to use any more forrein salt brought from out of other parts. When the Dardanians put in their claime for Pæonia, for that it had sometime bin their appertenance, & also confined upon their countrie; he pronounced freedome to all those who had bene subjects to king Perseus. But afterwards, when they could not obtain Pæonia, he graunted unto them the commoditie of the trafficke for salt; and he charged the inhabitants of the said countrie to carie it to Stobi in Pæonia, & he set them down a certain price. Item, he debarred them from selling any ship-timbre themselves, & from suffering any others, unto those countries which bordered upon the Barbarians (and except the third quarter all the rest confined upon them) he graunted that they might keepe armed garrisons upon their frontiers and marches. These Acts and ordinances thus published the first day of the session, wrought diversly in the minds of men. Freedome graunted beyond their expectation, and the easement in the yerely tribute, comforted their spirits & made them looke up. But by the interruption of the commerce & traffick one region with another, they seemed like creatures dismembred & plucked asunder joint-meale, so as having need one of another, yet they had no mutuall & reciprocall use & intercourse. In so much as the Macedonians themselves knew full litle how big & large Macedonie was, & how commodiously it was divided, so as ech part was sufficient in it self without the help of others. The first region containeth the Bisaltæ who inhabit beyond the river Nessus & about Strymon, the most valiant men of all the rest: besides, it hath many proper commodities by it self as well fruits of the earth as mines of mettals, together with the opportunitie & commodious situation of Amphipolis, which as a frontier-bar stoppeth all avenues on the East side into Macedonie. The second quarter hath in it two most famous & frequented cities, Thessalonica & Cassandria: also Pallene, a fertile & fruitfull land. Besides, the maritime commodities which the havens at Torone and the head of Athos (and it they call the port or rode of Æneis) do yeeld; to say nothing of other bayes lying handsomely, some toward the Iland Eubœa, others toward Hellepont. The third countrey containeth the famous cities Edeffa, Berthæa, and Pella; the warlike nation of the Veteij, and many Gaules and Illyrians besides who there inhabite, notable men all of action and execution. The fourth region is peopled with the Eordians, Lincestians, & Pelagonians: unto whom, the provinces Atintania, Strymphalis, and Elimiotis are adjoynd. All this quarter is cold rough & hard to dwell in. The nature of the inhabitants is likewise futable to the soile: & the fiercer they are by reason of the barbarous nations their neighbors, who one while find them occupied with war, & otherwhiles mingle their rites & fashions with theirs in time of peace. When Macedonie was thus divided and each part distinguished by their severall uses and commodities, hee appointed a generall review to be made and enrolment of all the Macedonians; having declared unto them before, that he purposed to give laws unto them.

This done, the Ætolians were cited and called next; and in the whole course of the commission as touching them and their affaires, more inquisition there was, who favoured the Romans, and who affected the king, than of any that either had done or suffered wrong. The murderers were found unguiltie and absolved, & the banishment of the exiled was as much avowed, as their death justified who were massacred: An. Babius onely was convicted and condemned, for that he had sent Romane souldiours to execute the said butcherie. This issue of the Ætolians cause, puffed up the spirits of all those who had sided with the Romans, throughout all the nations and cities of Greece, in such sort as they grew to a pride intolletable: but contrariwise put down and abased under their feet, as many as were suspected any waies to have cast a favour and born good will to the king. The principall states-men of their cities were of three sorts; two of them were skillfull in the art of soothing, and either by submitting and subjecting under the Romane empire, or winding within the favour and friendship of the KK. grew infinitely rich and mightie themselves in privat, with the publicke oppression and undoing of their countrey: the third betweene, sung a meane, and was crosse to the one and the other; men that stood for the defence of their liberties and maintenance of laws, who as they were more dearly beloved of their neighbours at home, so they were lesse gracious and of credit with strangers abroad. The favorites and supposts onely of the Romanes, were advanced by their prosperitie; they alone fate in place of government, they were employed in all embassages, and none but they. These beeing there present in great number coming out of Peloponnesus, Bæotia, and from other frequent assemblies of Greece, filled the heads of the ten delegates and high commissioners; buzzing into their eares, that not they alone who openly were leene in their braverie and vanitie of spirit, vanishing themselves for the hostes and friends of K. Perseus, but many more besides under-hand took part with him and favoured his proceedings: as for the rest (under a colour of maintaining libertie) practised in all their counsels and complotted against the Romans what they could: and never would the Greeke nations abide long in their alleageaunce, unlesse the hearts of that side were taken down and broken; and their authoritie onely cherished, confirmed, and strengthened, who regarded nothing else but the empire and soveraigntie of the Romanes. Vhen these had informed and presented divers by names sent for they were by the letters missive of the General, out of Ætolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Bæotia, to give their attendance and follow him to Rome, there to answer the cause. But into Achæa two of the high commissioners were sent, namely, C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius, who personally should summon them by vertue of their edict. And this was done for two considerations: the one, because they thought verily that the Achæans were more confident and couragious, and therefore would not obey the summons by letters, and peradventure also, Callicrates and other the informers and accusers who made presentment of their names, should be in some daunger of their lives: the other cause why they would be present to give them summons was this, that amongst the kings records and rols they had found the letters of the principall Statesmen of other nations; but of the Achæans there appeared no writing at all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them, were nothing evident.

After the Ætolians were dismissed, the nation of the Acarnanians was cited and called into place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration; onely Leucas was exempt from doing service to the high court and generall assembly of the Acarnanians. As they followed the inquisition still farther and farther, making enquire who either in publicke or privat had taken part with the king, they extended their commission as farre as into Asia; and sent Labæus to demolish and raze Antissa a citie in the Isle Lesbos, and to translate the inhabitants thereof to Methymna: the pretence was, for that they had given harbour in their haven to the provisions of Antenor the kings admirall, at what time as he hovered and raunged about Lesbos with his pinnaces. Two there were that lost their heads, men of qualitie and great worth, to wit, Andronicus the Ætolian, sonne of Andronicus, for that he followed his father and bare armes against the people of Rome; and Neon a Thebane, by whose advise and persuation they had contracted a societie with Perseus.

After this enquest of forrein causes interposed and coming betweene, the assembly of the Macedonians was called againe; wherein as touching the state of Macedonie, pronounced and published it was, That there should be certaine Senators chosen, whome they call Synedræ, by whose counsell the common-weale should be managed and governed. After this, were the names read

A read of the principall Macedonians, whome hee appointed (together with their children as many as were above fiftene yeeres of age) to goe before into Italie. This at first was thought to be an hard and cruell course, but anon it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians, that it was all done for their libertie. For nominated there were, the kings friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies, the admirals of the fleets, & the captains of the garisons, who were wont to serve the king basely, but to overrule others proudly and imperiously: some exceeding rich and wealthie, others spending above the proportion of their revenues and living: all faring at their table, and arraid in apparell like KK. not one carying with him the civill mind of a good citizen, not one that could abide to heare of lawes, or of equall libertie. All these theretore, who had been employed in any ministerie or service about the king, even they also who had been used in the least embassages that were, had commaundement to depart out of Macedonie and to goe into Italie: and looke who obeyed not this edict, were threatened with death. Vnto Macedonie hee gave lawes, with such diligent care and good regard, as if hee had reckoned them not for enemies vanquished, but for allies of good desert: such lawes (I say) as the verie practise and triall of long time (the onely corrector of all statutes) was not able upon that experience, to checke and controll.

After these serious affaires were finished, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a solemnitie of game and disport at Amphipolis, which long before he had intended, and for the intimation whereof he had both sent out his messengers to the States of Asia and to the KK. and also himselfe in his circuit and visitation of the Grecian cities, had given warning to the great men and principall citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cunning, feat, and artificiall actors, that made profession of such plaies and pastimes; besides a sort of wrestlers, champions, and brave horses of the best kind and breed. Also divers embassages with their beasts for sacrifices, and whatsoever els was usually done of custome, at the great and solempne gamings in Greece. Thus it came to passe, that men admired not onely his magnificence, but his wisdom also in exhibiting these shewes and sights, wherein the Romanes at that time were altogether rude and ignorant. Moreover he feasted and banquetted the embassadours, in the same sumptuous manner and respective consideration. And this (by report) was an apophthegme and common saying of his, That none could make feasts and set forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field. Having represented these solemnities of all sorts, and bestowed all the brasen shields a shipboard; all other armour and weapons of sundrie kinds, he piled upon a mightie heape, and after his praiers made to Mars, Minerva, dame Lus, and other gods and goddesses, unto whom of right and dutie appertained to consecrate and dedicate the spoiles of enemies; himselfe the Generall with his owne hands put under a burning torch, and kindled the fire, and after him all the marshall-colonels standing round about, cast every man his fire-brand, and set all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great assembly of Europe and Asia, where there was such a confluence of people from all parts, as well to testifie their joy in his behalfe, as to see the shewes and disports: in that meeting, I say, of so great armies of sea-servitours and land-souldiours, there was that plentie of all things and cheapenesse of victuals, that Emylus the Generall, of that exceeding store and abundance, gave much away freely to private persons, to cities and nations, not onely for their present use, but also to carie home with them into their countries. And this multitude there assembled, took not more pleasure either in beholding the stage-plaies acted, or seeing men practise feates of bodily strength and activitie, or the running of horses in the race, as in viewing the Macedonian bootie and pillage laid all abroad to be seen; namely of Statues, and painted tables, of rich cloth of tyssue, of vessels in gold, in silver, in copper, and yvorie, most curiously wrought in that roiall seat and citie of Pella, not onely to serve for a present shew & no more (like those that the kings pallace of * Alexandria was replenished with) but also for continuall and everlasting use. These were all embarked, and committed to the charge of Cn. Octavius to be transported to Rome. Paulus after he had given the embassadours a gracious and courteous farwell, passed over the river Strymon, and lodged within a mile of Amphipolis. From thence he dislodged and journeyed untill he came on the fift day as far as Pella. And passing by the citie, he abode two daies at a place which they call Spelæum, & then he sent P. Nasica, and Q. Maximus his owne sonne with part of the forces in an expedition, to give the waile unto those Illyrians, who had succoured Perseus in his warres, but he commaunded them to meet him at Oricum. Himselfe marching toward Epirus, at the fiftenth remove arrived ved at Passaron. Not farre from thence lay Anicius encamped: unto whome hee dispatched his letters, to the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution; signifying therein, that the Senate graunted to the armie the pillage of all the cities of Epirus, which had revolted unto Perseus: which done, hee suborned certaine Centurions, and sent them into all the townes with instructions, to give out that his comming was to withdraw all the garisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirotes should enjoy their freedome as well as the Macedonians; and so he summoned out of every citie ten of the cheefe to repair unto him. And when hee had charged and commaunded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and silver which they had, he sent out certaine cohorts and companies of souldiours to every of the said cities: they who were assigned for the places farther remote went before them which were appointed to the neerer; & this was ordered so, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once. Now the Colonels and Centurions had their errand delivered them what to doe. In the morning betimes all the gold and silver was brought forth together accordingly, and at the fourth hower of the day a signall was given to the souldiours to fall to ransacke and rife the cities. Wherein they found so great store of pillage, that every horseman had for his part * foure hundred Denarij, and the footmen two hundred apiece, and a hundred and fiftie thousand pois were led away into captivitie. Then the wals were rased of the said cities thus spoiled, and those were to the number of seventie. All the bootie and prizes were sold, and out of that masse of money were the souldiours paid. From thence Paulus went downe to the sea side, unto Oricum. But the souldiours minds were nothing so well satisfied, as he supposed they had ben, for discontented mightily they were & angrie, that they had no share at all in the kings pillage & treasure, as if they had made no warre in Macedonie. At Oricum he found those forces which he had sent under the conduct of Scipio Nasica and Maximus his sonne; there he shipped his whole armie, and sailed over into Italie. In like manner a few daies after, Anicius, when the session and generall meeting of the other Epirotes and Acarnanians was ended, having given commaundement, that their principall persons should follow him into Italie (the knowledge and deciding of whole causes hee reserved and referred thither) himselfe attended the ships which the armie had used in Macedonie, and passed over likewise into Italie.

At what time as these affaires were thus managed in Macedonie and Epirus, the embassadours who had been sent with Attalus to end the warre betweene the Gaules and king Eumenes, arrived in Asia. A surcease of armes for the winter time, was agreed upon betweene both parties, during which cessation the Gaules departed home, and Eumenes was retired to Pergamus there to winter, where also he lay grievously sick. The spring was no sooner come, but the Gauls began to stir and looke abroad: but by that time they were come as farre as to Synnada, Eumenes had assembled his forces from all parts to Sardeis. There at Synnada, the Romans parled with Solovetius the Generall of the Gaules; Attalus also went with them: but thought good it was not, that hee should enter within the Gaules campe, for feare of stirring coales in heat of argument, and raising choler of the one side or other. So P. Licinius communed with the duke of the Gauls aforesaid: and when he had done, he brought word backe, that the more hee was entreated and spoken faire, the worse hee was and lesse tractable; insomuch as it might seeme a wonder, that the words of the Romane embassadours were so powerfull and effectually with Antiochus and Ptolemeus (two mightie and puissant kings) as to make peace so presently between them, since they prevailed so little or nothing at all among the Gaules.

To returne againe to Rome. First, the two captive kings, Perseus and Gentius were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children: after them, the multitude besides of prisoners, then consequently those Macedonians, as also the other cheefe peeres of Greece, who were warned to repaire unto Rome. For not they only were summoned to make apparence there, who had been scene present in place; but also all those were sent for by letters missive peremptorily, who were but reported to have bene with the kings. Then Paulus himselfe a few daies after, embarked in a ship of the kings, a galeace of a mightie bignesse, making way with fixtene bankes and rewes of oares to a side, and the same set out and adorned with the Macedonian M spoiles, not onely of brave gorgeous armour, but also of rich hangings, tyssue, and cloth of gold out of the kings wardrobe, came up the Tyber against the stream: where great numbers of people went forth to meet him, and filled the banks on both sides of the river. Some few daies after Anicius and Octavius arrived also with their fleet. And to all three, by an act of the Senat was triumph granted.

A graunted. Octavius the Pretour had commaundement to deal with the Tribunes of the Commons by warrant from the Senate, that they should preferre a bill unto the common people, that those three should be in full commission of commaund and governement, that day when they were to ride triumphant into the citie. See, how meane things escape the touch of envie, but the highest commonly are met with. No doubt was made at all of the triumph of Anicius, ne yet of Octavius. But Paulus, with whom even they themselves would have been abashed to compare, could not avoid the backbiting of slanderous and malicious tongues. His souldiours according to the auncient discipline of warre, he had held hard to their service. And to them had he given a donative indeed out of the bootie, but more niggardly and with a lighter hand than they hoped for, from out of so great wealth and riches of the kings: & yet in good faith to say a truth, full well he knew that if he had satisfied their greedie desire, and dealt still amongst them till they had cried Ho, he should have left himselfe just nothing to have brought into the common treasure. So that all this Macedonian armie gave a shew by this time, as if they had but cold devotion to their Generall, either to appeare, or to give their voices for the setting forward of the bill aforesaid, as touching his triumph & plenarie power of commaund, when the day of assembly should come. Over and besides, Ser. Sulpitius Galba, who had been a martiall Colonell in the second legion, in Macedonie, and in private enmitie with the Generall; both himselfe in person was in hand with them, and by the souldiours also of his owne legion sollicit and spurred on the rest to appeare in sufficient number, there for to give their suffrages against him, and checke the bill: saying, That as he was an imperious and lordly commaunder, so hee was as miserable a pinch-pennie withall, and a good deed it were to denie his grace and to crosse the law propofed for his triumph, & so to be revenged of him throughly: for no doubt the commons of the citie would goe that way that they should see the souldiours to lead before. He could not forsooth (say they) give money among his souldiours liberally: well, he shall surely know, that his souldiours yet can give him honour; but never let him looke for the fruit of favor and grace, where he hath deserved none. These words set them agog; and when Tib. Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons read out and published the foresaid bill in the Capitoll, and that by permission of law any privat person might have spoken thereto, and no man came forth, as beeing a matter whereof no doubt and question was to be made: then Servius Galba sodainly slept forth, and required of the Tribune, That (forasmuch as it was so far forth dayes, as being the eight houre therof, so that D he had not time enough to declare and shew at large, what allegations he had why they should not graunt L. Emilius a triumph) they would adjourne the assembly to the next day, and betimes in the morning set the matter on foot againe; for that he had need of a whole day and no lesse, to plead that cause to the full as he should doe. But when the Tribune willed him againe to speake his mind that day, if he had ought to say; he made a speech, and with his long oration held the court untill it was within night: putting them in mind and alleading, How precisely and rigorously he had exacted at their hands all militarie duties; how he had imposed upon the souldiours more painfull and dangerous labour than need was: but contrariwise in dealing rewards and bestowing honourable recompences for good service, hee was over-straight laced and too short in every point: and verily souldierie and warfare, if it continued still under such captaines, E will be more hard, travellsome, and rough to souldiours and warriours: but when all is done and victory obtained, rewarded it shall be with bare povertie and neglect of honour. Certes the Macedonians are in better case yet than the Romane souldiours. But if they would be present in great frequency the next morrow for to denie and revoke this bill, then these rich and mightie men shall know full wel, That all lieth not in the hands of the captaine and commaunder, but that the souldiours also can doe somewhat. The souldiours animated and induced with these perillous words, resorted the day following in so great multitudes, and pestered the whole Capitoll so full, as none but they could come in to give their voice. The first tribes that were called in, clearly casted the grace: which when the principall and cheefe men of the citie saw, they ran all into the Capitoll, with open mouth crying out upon this indignitie offered, That L. Paulus a conqueror F in so great and daungerous a war, should be deprived of his due triumph; and the grand Commanders and Generals of the field were now subjected and enthralled to the looke licentiousnesse and greedie avarice of their souldiours. In this one thing (say they) have we too too much faulted, such hath been our favour and partialitie, and so loth have we been to displease any: but what will become of us in the end, if souldiours once may come to be lords and maisters, & thus to crow over over their Generals? And every man railed and cried out upon Galba. In the end after this garboile was appeased, M. Servilius who sometime had bene Confull and great maister of the horse under the Dictatour, requested the tribunes that they would begin all again, annulling that which was past, & give him leave withall to make a speech before the people. The Tribunes went aside to consult of this matter; and in fine, over-ruled with the authoritie and countenance of the nobles and peeres of the citie, began to treat afresh and goe in hand with all matters anew, making it known openly that they would recall back those first tribes, in case M. Servilius and other private men who were willing to utter their mind to the cause had once spoken. Then said Servilius as followeth, Maisters and friends, citizens here of Rome, if and by nothing else it might bee judged, how singular and how excellent a commander Lucius Aemilius was in the field, this onely (if there were no more) may suffice, that having in his campe such seditious and light headed persons for his souldiours, and an adversarie of his owne among them, so noble of birth, so rash of action, and withall so arrogant and selfe-conceited, readie to incite and stirre up a multitude to commotion, yet troubled he never was with any mutinie at all in his whole armie. The same severitie it was in government and conduct, that held them in awe and good order, which now at this present they hate and detest. And so long as they were mannaged by auncient discipline, they durst not quetch nor give offence. As for Sergius Galba, if (like a new barrister who is to shew the first prooffe, and to give the assaye and hanfell of his eloquence) he would have made choise of Lucius Paulus to begin withall and accuse him at the barre, he should not yet have hindered his triumph, which (if there were nothing else to dissuade and draw him backe) the Senate had judged to be just & due: but the morrow after his triumph (when he had seene him a private man againe) he might have given presentment of his name, and by order of law ministred interrogatories unto him & so entred proceffe: or rather he might have staid a little longer, namely untill himselfe had bene a magistrat in place, & then have gone roundly to worke, arrested him upon an action to answer at aday, and so accused him judicially before the people. Thus should L. Aemilius have had his triumph for reward and recompence of his well doing, in that so nobly and valiantly he had conducted this warre: thus likewise should hee have suffered condigne punishment, if he had committed ought unworthie either of his auncient glorie or this new honour. But will you have the truth? when he could find no matter of crime to reproach him with, he sought by waies and indirect meanes to detract his well deserved praises. Hee demanded yesterday, one full day to accuse L. Paulus: and foure houres, even all the day time that was left he spent in making an invective against him. What prisoner was there ever brought to the barre culpable & sinful, but all the faults of his whole life might be ripped up, deciphered, and painted forth in so many houres space? But what objected he all that while, that L. Paulus if hee were to frame his defence, would wish to denie? O that some man would procure me here for the while, two assemblies & courts, the one of Romane souldiours employed lately in Macedonia; the other more pure & uncorrupt of the twain, namely of citizens sounder in judgement, void of all favor, & cleere from hatred. And the people of Rome I would have to be the judge. First let Paulus be accused in the graund assembly and court of these citizens. Tell mee, O Sergius Galba, what would you say against him before those Quirites of Rome. For there you should have bene cut off and lost all this discourse & special part of your oration, carrying these terms, You looked too straightly & precisely to the corps de garde in their stations; you held the souldiours too hard to their watch and ward; the sentinels were needrely and narrowly looked unto; and you were over curious about going the rounds and relieving the watch in the night season; about the works and fabbricks you put the souldiours to more toiling and moiling than heerebefore; whiles you, my lord Generall, their surveieur, overseer, and taske-maister, rode all about to exact the utmost with all extremities in one and the same day when you had the armie on foot, presently from a jounie you led them forth to battaile; when the victorie was gotten, you would not suffer the souldiour to breath and take repose, but caused him to march immediately and to follow the enemy in chase; also, whereas the bootie to be parted & shared out, might have enriched your self, yet will you carrie the kings treasure in shew of triumph, and then lay it up in the chamber of the citie. As these be shrewd matters, like sharpe goads to pricke those souldiours and set them on, who thinke they have not scope enough to serve their dissolute loosenes, or too small allowance to content their covetous appetites: so, with the people of Rome they would have nothing at all prevailed: who if they should not call to mind examples and stories of old, which they have heard their fathers talke of; namely, what overthrowes have bene received through the indulgence and popularitie of Generals; and contrariwise what victories have bene achieved by their severe discipline and government: yet at leastwise they cannot chuse but remember what odds & difference there was in the late Punicke warre, betweene M. Minutius Generall of the horse, and Q. Fabius Atax, his Dictatour. And therefore since the accuser might know all this, the defence of Paulus in this behalfe was altogether needlesse and unnecessary. Let us go now to the other audience & assembly of the Macedonie souldiours. But now me thinks I must not call you Quirites any more, but souldiours: if haply there be so much grace in you, as that this name yet may cause you to blush, & be abashed for very shame of the world, to offer abuse unto your General. And verily for mine owne part, I find a great change in my selfe, and am otherwise affected in my mind, now that I see me to speake unto an armie of souldiours, than ere-whiles I was, when my Oration was accomodate and framed to the commons of a cittie. Now souldiours, what say you to the matter? Is there any one at Rome (but Perperus againe) that would not have a triumph over the Macedonians? and are you not readie to pull such a one in peeces with those very hands, wherewith you vanquished the Macedonians? He, whosoever he is, that impeacheth you for entering into the citie in triumph, trust me truly, would have debarred you of victorie, if it had bin in his power. Lo, how foully are yee deceived (souldiours) and farre out of the way, if yee thinke that the triumph is the honour only of the Generall, and not of the souldiours likewise, & consequently of the whole people of Rome. This is not Paulus his case alone. Many others likewise there have bene, who when they could not obtaine triumph at the hands of the Senat, triumphed nevertheless upon the Albane mountaine. As impossible it is for any man to bereave L. Paulus of the honour due for the finishing of the Macedonian war, as it was to disappoint C. Lucatius of his glorie for ending the first Punicke war; P. Cornelius for the second; or others besides who after them triumphed. It is not a triumph that can make Lucius Paulus better or worse, either the greater capitaine or the lesse. Herein consisteth the credit, renowne, and reputation of the souldiours and of all the people of Rome more than his: for feare least they be reputed and noted either for envious and malicious, or else unthankfull for their best members and noblest citizens; and therein seem to imitate the people of Athens, who evermore persecute and plague with envie their best men that live amongst them. Your aunceltours and forefathers when time was, faulted this waies enough (ywis) in the person of Camillus, whom they offered abuse unto, before the citie by his means was recovered out of the Gaules hands. Much you were to blame your selves here, and ever much too (I may tell you) in P. Africanus, That in Liternum, his mansion house and place of habitation (who was the conquerour of Africke) should bee shewed: that in Liternum (I say) the sepulchre of P. Africanus should be seene. Let us blush for very shame, that L. Paulus, as hee is equall to them in glory and honour, should likewise go with them and have his part of your hard and wrongfull dealing. The first thing that yee doe then, let bee this: Our with this spot and staine of infamie which yee have caught; so reprochfull in regard of other nations, so hurtfull to your selves. For, who will ever hereafter wish to be like Africanus? who will endeavour to resemble L. Paulus, in a citie so unthankfull, nay so spitefull and malicious to all good men? Say there were no question at all of infamie and obloquie, but of honour only and reputation, tell me (I beseech you) is there any triumph that compriseth not the glory also of the Romane name? So many triumphes over the Gaules, so many againe over the Spaniards, and so many over the Carthaginians, are they reputed and called the triumphs of the capitaine alone, and not likewise of the people of Rome? And like as we say, that we triumphed not over Pyrhus onely, nor over Anniball, but over the Epirots likewise and the Carthaginians: even so neither Mar. Curius alone, nor P. Cornelius, but the Romans also have triumphed. True it is, and I must needs say, that the souldiours have a proper interest and part by themselves, in that they alone (dight with branches and chaplets of laurell, and every one bravely to be seene & adorned with the gifts that have been given them) resound to Triumphe, to Triumphe, and as they passe along the city sing and chaunt the praises of themselves and of their capitaine-Generals. And if it fortune at any time that the souldiours be not brought home out of the province to the triumph, they grumble and are discontented: and yet notwithstanding, absent though they be, they thinke it is their due: and so long as their Generall and leader triumpheth, they triumph also, because the victory was achieved by the strength of their armes. Good souldiours, if a man should aske you, for what intent you were reconducted into Italie? and wherefore so soone as the service was performed

and the warre brought to an end, yee had not presently your congie of discharge? moreover, to what purpose yee came by companies and squadrons under your ensignes and colours? for what cause yee stay and remaine here, and goe not every man his waies to his owne home? what answer would ye make els, but, That yee would be seene in triumph? And to say a truth, since yee have woon the victorie and are conquerours, I cannot blame you; nay, yee ought to desite for to be seene and seene againe. It is not long since we triumphed over Philip (this mans father) and over Antiochus likewise: and reigned both they did as KK. when the triumph was: and shal there be no solemnitie of triumph over Perseus, taken prisoner and brought captive with his children, into the citie? If L. Paulus, standing beneath as a privat person (one amongst the meinie of good ned citizens) seeing L. Anticus and Gn. Octavius attired sumptuously in cloth of gold, and in their rich purple robes and mantels of estate, mounting up the Capitoll in their triumphant charriots, should aske them the question and say in this manner: Tell me, o Lucius Anticus and you Gn. Octavius, judge yee in your owne conceit that you are more worthy of a triumph than I? They would no doubt come downe each one out of his chariot and yeeld him their place, yea and for very shame deliver up all their ensignes and ornaments unto him. And you Quirites, had you rather see Gentius than Perseus led in triumph? would you wish indeed to triumph for an accidentall appendant only of the war, rather than for the maine substance of the war? Shall the legions coming out of Sclavonia, and the mariners at sea, enter the citie crowned with laurell garlands; and the legions out of Macedonie, beeing denied their owne triumph, stand still and behold others to triumph? Moreover, what shall become of that rich bootie? what shall be done with the spoiles of that great and wealthie victorie? where shall be bestowed and laid up so many thousand corslets and armours plucked from the bodies of enemies slaine? Shall they be sent backe againe into Macedonie? Those costly images of gold, of marble, of yvorie; those goodly faire pictures; those pretious clothes and hangings of purple, scarlet, and tyssue; that mightie quantitie of gold and silver wrought into vessels chased and engraven; that huge masse of the kings money and coine, what shall we do with it? What? shall it be carried all by night as stollen goods into the publicke treasure and citie chamber? The goodliest sight of all the rest, what say you to it? A most noble and puissant king is taken prisoner; where shall hee be shewed to the people of Rome his conquerour? What running, what concourse there was of people to see K. Syphax captive (and yet he was but an accessarie to the Punick war) most of us do well remember. Shall K. Perseus then, a prisoner and captive; shall Philip and Alexander his sonnes, (persons of so great name) be hidden and kept from the sight and eyes of the citie? And there were no more but L. Aemilius himselfe, twice Consul, the conqueror and subduer of Greece, all men would desire to see him enter the citie in his triumphant chariot. We created him Consul for this intent, that he should finish & determine this war, which to your dishonor and great shame had hung for the space of foure yeeres. To him then, who (at what time as the lot of that province fell unto him, and when he departed on his voiage from Rome) had all our hearts to presage victorie & triumph, shal we now deny triumph when he hath the victorie? And verily in so doing, we shall not only defraud men, but rob the gods also of their honor; for due it is to the very gods also, and not to men alone. Have not your ancestors ever used to enterprise all great affairs in the name of the gods first, and therein also to end last? The Cos. or Pretor, when he is to take his journey into his province, or to levie war, with his Licitors before him clad in their cotes of armes, is ever wont to make his solemn vows in the Capitoll: after he hath acquit himselfe of his charge & obtained victorie, when as he triumpheth, he transferreth in pompe the rich presents of the people of Rome so well deserved, and offereth them to the same gods in the said Capitoll, unto whom there first he pronounced his vows. And the beasts for sacrifice going before the pompe of triumph, are not the least part of this solemnitie: that it may appear, how the General in his returne is mindfull of the gods, & rendereth thanks unto them for the happie managing of the affairs of the Commonweale. As for all those beasts for sacrifice which he hath appointed & referred to be thewed in the pompe of triumph, slay them; neither makes it matter whose hand doth it: some kill one and some another, but those sacred viands of the Senat, which are not to be eaten in any private house, nor in publick place prophane and unhallowed, but only in the Capitoll; and there not for the pleasure of men, but of gods and men together, will yee trouble and impeach at the suggestion of Servius Galba? Shall the gates be shut against the triumph of L. Paulus? Shall Perseus, king of the Macedonians, with his children and the multitude besides of captives, with the spoils of the Macedonians, bee left behind at the river side? shall L. Paulus goe directly from the citie to gate home to his house as a private person, like one that hath bene abroad in the country to see his ferme, and is newly returned? But thou Centurion and thou souldiour, give care, I advise thee, to the ordinance which the Senate hath decreed as touching the General Paulus, rather than to the bibble babble of Serv. Galba: hearken to this, that I say the word, rather than hee. As for him, he hath learned nought els but to prate and talke, and that to the depraving of others full maliciously. I tell thee, fought have I with mine enemies even upon defiance given twentie times and three; done I have my devoir, and from them all that were in combat with me, I never failed but carried away their spoiles; I bear the marks about me of many a wound, & the honorable skars therof are to be seene, all of them in the breast and forepart of my bodie. At which word, they say, hee bared his naked skin, and related withall in what battell he had received this or that wound: Now as he shewed these skars, and chaunced to discover some parts that better ywis and more honestly had bene unseen, and therewith, a bunch or swelling of a rupture that hee had in his groin, wherat some of them that stood next unto him took up a laughter, then (qd. he) even as this that you have espied here and make such game at, I caught with a strain, riding continually as I did, and never from my horseback day nor night: and no more ashamed I am and displeased with my selfe for that infirmite, than for these skarres which you here see; since that it never was any impediment unto me in performing my service to the Commonweale, either in civile affairs of citie, or in warfare abroad. Well, I an old servitor, have been content here to shew unto young men and warfildours, my bodie, many a time and often hacked, perced and slashed with the sword. Let Galba now lay bare that whole skin of his owne so flicke and smooth. Now my maisters, you that are Tribunes, call the tribes againe to the scrutinie, and take their voices. As for me, downe I will, and goe after the souldiours hard at heeles. Know I will which be those lewd and unthankfull companions that had rather be soothed up and flattered in the warres by mutinous persons, than serve under the martiall discipline of their General.]

Valerius Antias reporteth, That the summe of all the gold and silver taken in pillage and carried in the pompe of this triumph, amounted to the worth of 120 millions of Sesterces. Which masse, no doubt, ariseth much greater by the proportion of the number of waines, and the poises both of gold and silver by the same authour set downe in generall sums. And as some have recorded, he either spent in the warre next before, or els scattered and lost in his flight when he made hast to Samothrace, as much againe as that came to. And the more wonder it was, that so mightie a masse of money had bene gathered and heaped up within thirtie yeeres after the warre betweene Philip and the Romanes, raised part out of the issue and advenues of his metall mines, and part out of other profites and tributes. Thus Philip very bare of money, and Perseus contrariwise exceeding rich, began to make warre with the Romanes. Last of all, Paulus himselfe rode in his chariot, carrying a great port and majestie with him, both for his comely and personable bodie, and also for his reverent old age. After his chariot, among other honourable personages rode his two sonnes, Q. Maximus and P. Scipio. Then followed the horsemen by troupes, and the footmen by their cohorts and companies, every one keeping their ranks full decently. The footmen had given them a hundred Sesterces apeece, the Centurions double, and the horsemen triple so much. And it is thought, that hee meant to have given the footmen as much as the most, and to the rest in proportion, in case they either had not denied his honour by their voices, or if in token of thankfulness and joy, they had but willingly and cheerefully shouted, when this summe which they received was pronounced & related unto them. And not Perseus alone (led as hee was through the enemies citie in chaines before the triumphant chariot of the conqueror) but also Paulus himselfe the victor, glittering so gloriously in his cloth of gold and costlly purple, was a mirrour to the word in those few daies, of the transitorie and mutable state of mans life. For of those two sonnes, whome (after hee had given the other two by way of adoption from himselfe) hee kept alone at home as heires to beare his name, to maintain the sacred rites and sacrifices of his familie, and to uphold the house it selfe, the younger, a stripling under twelve yeares of age, five daies before his triumph died; and the elder full foureteen yeares old and more, departed within three daies after the triumph. Which two youths indeed ought to have bene attired in their embrodered robes of purple, and so to have ridden in the chariot with their father, predestining and aiming to themselves the like G triumphs another day.

The Oration of
L. Aemilius Paullus to the people of Rome.

Some few daies after, M. Antonius a Tribune of the Commons assembled a solemne audience of the people for his sake, wherein when after the maner & custome of other Generals he should discourse of his owne exploits and worthie acts, he made unto them a memorable Oration and well beseeching a noble Romane prince, to this effect. Albeit I suppose (quoth he) my neighbors and friends, the citizens of this noble citie, you be not ignorant, both how happily I have admittred the weale publick, & also how unfortunately within these few daies, two thunderbolts have shaken my private house, as having one while beheld the goodly shew and pomp of my triumph testifying the one, and seene another while the wofull funerals and obsequies of my two sonnes declaring the other; yet I beseech you suffer mee with that singlenesse of heart and affection, as I H ought, to make a breefe comparison between mine own particular private fortune, and the publicke felicitie of the citie. At my departure from Italie, I loosed from Brundisium, and set up saile at the sunne rising by the ninth hour of the same day I arrived safe with all my ships at Corphu. The first day after I came to Delphi, where I sacrificed unto Apollo, for my selfe, for your armies and your navie. From Delphi I departed, and within five daies was in the leaguer. Where, after I had received the charge of the armie, and altered some things which might greatly have hindered the victorie, I marched forward, for that the enemies campe was inexpugnable, and the king could not be forced by any meanes to fight: and piercing through his guards that kept the passage, I went as farre as Petra: so as by this meanes having perforce drawne the king to fight, I vanquished him in plaine field and raunged battell. Macedonie I subdued, and brought it in subjection to the people of Rome. Finally, that warre which for foure yeeres together other Con- suls beforome so managed, as each one left it ever to his successeur worse than hee found it, I achieved and brought to a finall end in fifteene daies. I followed then in this traine other prosperous affaires, as the fruits ensuing of that victorie. For all the cities of Macedonie yielded unto me. The kings treasure I seized upon: the king in person (as if the very gods themselves had delivered and put him into my hands) I tooke prisoner, with his sonnes in the temple of the Samothracians. But then my heart misgave me, and even then I suspected the surpassing and excessive favour of my good fortune: then cast I doubts, and began to feare the daungers at sea, having so mightie a masse of the kings treasure to transport, and my victorious armie to reconduct backe into Italie. But seeing all things fall out to hearts desire, a prosperous voiage, a safe ar- rivall, and whatsoever I could pray for at the gods hands; this I wished in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune, when she is at the highest pitch, to tume backe againe and come as fast downe) that mine owne house, rather than the Commonweale, might feele that change and alteration whensoever it came. And therefore I hope that this so notable calamitie of mine owne, shall excuse the citie for having any other misfortune, since that my triumph (as it were to checke and mocke the chaunges of this world) hath fallen so just between the funerals of my two sons. See how I and Perseus are represented above all others for two notable examples of the fraile and unstable condition of man. Lo how he, who being a prisoner himself, saw his sonnes likewise led captives before his face, hath them yet living sound and safe: and I, who have triumphed over him, came from the buriall of one of my sonnes to ride in my chariot up to the Capitoll, & from thence descended againe to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair issue that I had, one left to bear the name of L. Paulus Aemilius. For two of them the house of the Cornelii and the Fabij have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as out of a great race and breed of children: so as now, in the familie of Paulus there is not one left but him selfe. Howbeit for this calamitie and ruine of my house, your felicitie and the happy estate of the citie is a great comfort and consolation againe. These words delivered with such a magnanimitie, troubled the spirits of the auditors, and astonished them more, than if hee had lamentably moned himselfe unto them with pittorous teares, for his childlesse estate and desolate condition.

C. Octavius solemnised his navall triumph over king Perseus the first day of December: in which solemnitie, he neither had prisoners led in shew, nor spoiles carried in pompe. He gave to his mariners and sailers sevenie and five Denarij apeece; to every pilot double, and to the ship-maisters four times as much. After this the Senat assembled, and the LL. ordained, That Q. C. Ca-

A. S. should lead king Perseus with his sonne Alexander, together with his traine that accompanied him, as also bring all his money and goods, silver, or what moveables and furniture soever he had to Alba, there to be kept in safe custodie. Bitis the kings son of Thrace, with the hostages was sent to Carseoli, there to lie in safe ward. As for the rest of the captives who had ben led in triumph, thought good it was they should be clapt up fast in prison.

Some few daies after these things, there arrived embassadours from Corys king of the Thracians, bringing with them money for the raunfome of his sonne and the other hostages. Into the Senat they were brought; where, by way of preamble they laid this for the ground of their speech, That Corys had not sided to king Perseus in the warre, upon his owne motive and accord, but was compelled to give hostages: then they besought the LL. of the Senate to suffer them to bee redeemed at what price soever they would set downe, were it never so high. Unto whom this answer was returned by authoritie of the Senate, That the people of Rome bare well in mind the amitie which they had with Corys, with his progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the giving of the hostages, it was rather an evidence to proove, than an argument to excuse their trespass and fault: considering that when Perseus was quiet, the Thracian nation stood in no feare and aw of him, much lesse then, when as he was troubled and occupied in war with the Romanes. Howbeit although Corys preferred the favour of Perseus before the friendship of the people of Rome, yet they would consider of the matter, and respect more his qualitie and what was meet for his estate, than his desert and what he was worthe to have; and therefore they would release his sonne and the hostages, and send them home againe. As for the people of Rome, their manner is to bestow their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompence: the worth and estimation whereof they had rather leave to the consideration and minds of the receivers, than require & demand the same presently. So there were embassadours nominated to reconduct the hostages into Thrace, to wit, T. Quintius Flaminius, C. Licinius Nerdas, & M. Cavinus Rebilus. And to those Thracian embassadours were given by way of presents 2000 asses apeece. So Bitis with the rest of the hostages was sent for from Carseoli, and with the forenamed embassadours returned againe to his father.

The kings ships taken from the Macedonians, of an extraordinarie and monstrous bignes before time, were landed upon Mars field and there laid up drie. Whiles the late remembrance of the Macedonian triumph remained still not in the minds onely; but as it were in the very eyes of men, L. Anicius triumphed over king Gentius and the Illyrians upon the very day of the feast  Quirinalis*. It was generally thought that all things therein rather resembled some likeness in shew, than otherwise countervailed in substance the former triumph. The General himself Anicius was inferiour to Aemilius both in nobilitie and also in qualitie of person: and setting together their places of commaund, the one being but Pretour, and the other Consull; neither was Gentius equal to Perseus, nor the Illyrians to the Macedonians. Spoile for spoile, money for money, gifts for gifts, there was no proportion nor comparison betweene them. And therefore as that freest late triumph was more resplendent & glorious than this, so considered in it selfe without other respect, it was not to be found fault withal & despised. Anicius within few daies had vanquished and thoroughly tamed the nation of the Illyrians; both by sea and land, ptowd and mightie, bearing themselves stout and bold for their strong and fenced forts. The king hee tooke prisoner, and those of the kings race and roiall blood. He shewed in triumph many field-ensights, besides other spoiles and moveable goods of the king. Likewise of gold seven and twentie pound weight, and of silver nine score; besides 3000 Denarij, and a hundred and twentie thousand peeces of Illyrian silver in coine. Before his chariot were led king Gentius with his wife & children; Caracantus also the kings brother, and certaine noblemen of Illyricum. Out of the pillage hee gave unto his footmen five and fortie Denarij apeece, to every Centurion a double proportion; and unto the horsemen a triple. To the allies of the Latine nation he allowed as much as to citizens: the sailers and mariners he made equal with the footmen. Herein he surmounted the triumph of Aemilius, for that his souldiours followed after his triumphant chariot more jocound and merry, and the Generall was praised and extolled in many a dittie and ballad. Antias writeth, That of his bootie there was raised as much money as came to twentie millions of Sestertij, over and above the gold & silver that went into the common treasurie. But because I could not see how possibly such a summe should be made, I have set downe mine author for the thing, now, chuse you whether ther you will beleeve him. King Gentius with his wife, children, and brother, was by order from the Senate led to Spoletium, there to be kept in ward: all the captives besides were at Rome cast into prison, and there lay. But when the Spoletines refused to take the charge and custodie of him & the rest, these princes were translated from thence to Igiturium. There remained besides of the Illyrian prizes two hundred and twentie barks, which being taken from king Gentius, Q. Cassius by the ordinance of the Senate gave and distributed among the citizens of Corphu, Apollonia, and Dyrrhachium.

The Consuls that yeere after they had onely wasted the territories of the Ligutians, because they could never traine the enemies forth to fight, having done no memorable service returned to Rome for the choise of new magistrates in the roome of the old. And so the first comitiall or court day that came, they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Sulpitius Gallus. The morrow after were elected for Pretors L. Linus, L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. Licinius Nerva, P. Rubilius Calvus, P. Quinctilius Varus, and Marcus Fonteus. These Pretours had their governement in this manner: two for the jurisdiction within the cittie, two for Spaine, the other for Sicilie and Sardinia. This yeere leapt, and the leap day was the morrow after the feast Terminalia. That yeere died C. Claudius the Augur, and in his place the colledge of the Augurs chose T. Quintius Flaminius. Also M. Fabius Pretor the Flamin of Quirinus the same yeere departed this life. This yeere also came king Prusias to Rome with his sonne Nicomedes. He entred into the cittie with a great traine attending upon him: from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunall of Q. Cassius the Pretour. And when there was a great concourse of people about him from all parts; he said that his comming was to worship the gods which are the presidents of the cittie of Rome, as also to salure the people of Rome, and withall to shew his own joy and to with theirs for their happie victorie over the two kings Perseus and Gentius, and for that by subduing the Macedonians and Illyrians, they had enlarged their seignorie and dominion. And when the Pretour made an offer to call a Senate for him even that present day, if he would to himselfe he desired two daies respite, to see the temples of the gods, to view the cittie, and to visite his good friends and acquaintance. L. Cornelius Scipio the treasurer was appointed to goe about with him and shew him all: who also had bene sent as farre as to Capua for to meet him upon the way; also for him and his traine about him, there was a sufficient house taken up; where he was kindly and liberally intertained. The third day after he came into the Senate, where after he had congratulated in their behalfe for their late victorie, he recounted his owne demerites and good defenses during the warre: and then requested, that he might have leave to pay his vowes: and namely to sacrifice at Rome in the capitoll, ten head of greater beasts, and one at Preneste to Fortune. For that he said those vowes were made for the victorie of the people of Rome. Also, that the league and alliance with him might be renewed. Item, that the land woon by conquest from king Antiochus, which beeing not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gauls notwithstanding held in possession, might be conveyed unto him by a deed of gift. Last of all, hee recommended his sonne Nicomedes to the Senate. He found much favour among all them who had bene Generals of annies in Macedonie. And therefore he obtained directly all other suits that he made: onely as touching the said lands, this aunswere he had, That they would send certein commissioners to see and view the thing. And if it appeared & fell out, that the foresaid land appertained to the people of Rome, and was not passed away by gift to any already, they would repute king Prusias the worthiest man of all other, to receive that donation at their hands. But if it never belonged to king Antiochus, and so was plaine and evident that the people of Rome had no right unto it, or if the Gauls had a graunt thereof already, Prusias then must bee content and pardon them, if they were unwilling to gratify him with any gifts prejudiciall & injurious to another. Neither could a thing being never so freely given, be an acceptable gift, which he knew the donor may take away from the donee at his pleasure. As for Nicomedes his son, they would willingly receive him into their protection at his hands so recommended. And how carefull and tender the people of Rome was over kings children committed unto them to keep, may appear by Ptolemaeus the K. of Egypt. With this answer was Prusias dismissed. Order was given that he should be presented with a certaine summe of sesterces, and with silver plate to the quantitie of 50 pound weight. Also they ordained that his sonne Nicomedes should have gifts proportionable to that summe which was given Masgaba the sonne of Masanissas; also that beasts and all other things appertaining

Appertaining to sacrifices, should be allowed unto the king out of the cittie-chamber, like as to the magistrates of Rome, chuse whither he would stay and offer them at Rome or Preneste. Also that out of that fleet which rid in the harbour of Brundisium, there should be twentie gallies assigned him to use, untill such time as the king were arrived at the fleet which was given him. Finally that L. Cornelius Scipio should accompanie him & never depart from him, but bear the charges both of him & his retinue about him untill they were embarked & ashipbourn. It is said that the king joied wonderously at this courtesie and kindnes offered him by the people of Rome, & that he would needs pay for those presents which were given him: onely hee commaunded his son to take a gift at the hands of the people of Rome. Thus much have our historians written as touching K. Prusias. But Polybius reporteth, that this K. was unwoorthe the majesty of so honorable a name, for that he was wont to meet the embassadours of Rome with his head shaven and a cap upon it; also to acknowledge & cal himselfe the freed villaine and vassalle of the people of Rome, and to testifie so much, he ware the badge and token of that degree and condition. At Rome likewise when he entred the Counsel-house, hee stouped downe and kissed the very doore sill, calling the Senatours gods, his saviours, yea and to have used other speeches not so honourable to the hearers, as bese and unfitting his own person.

When hee had sejournd in and about the cittie not above thirte daies, hee tooke his leave and departed into his owne Realme.

To the Reader.

From the five and fortith booke forward, all the rest of Livie (to the great maim & blemish of the Latin tongue, and no small grieve of learned men) is lost, even 100 bookes wanting five, like as those ten betweene the tenth and one & twentieth bookes, commonly called the second Decade. For as it appeareth by L. Florus the Epitomist, there were in all 140: and the arguments of so many remaine at this day, by him collected. But if it be true that Frauncis Petrarch saith, Livie wrote in all 142: and as Charles Sigonius probably coniectureth, the 36 and 37 Breviaries of L. Florus be wanting of this latter number. How all these complete bookes of T. Livius should miscarrie, it is not certainly knowne. Some hope there is, that they are but mis-cast and laid out of the way. For like as within these hundred yeeres some fragments of the storie were discovered in Magunce: and the last five bookes now extant, found by Simon Grinaeus in the Librarie of a monasterie over-against the citie of Wormbs, and dedicated by Erasmus of Rotterdam unto Charles, the son of William lord Montjoy, in the reigne of Henrie the eight of famous memorie K. of England, &c. so wee are not to despaire of the rest. In the meane time, we must make much of these brieve summaries left unto us. Even as therefore I have inserted those ten Breviaries in stead of the bookes: so I thought it not amisse (in hope that one day the verie bookes themselves will come to light) to proceed in the rest following: and the rather, for that neither hee that translated Livie into the Tuscan language, nor they who have done him into French (as farre as I could ever see) have taken that paines.

Eumenes came towards Rome. Now because in the Macedonian warre he had carried himselfe indifferent betweene Persus and the Romanes, there passed a law in generall tearmes, That no King might repaire to Rome; to the end, that if he were excluded, he should not be reputed an enemy: nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleared of all fault. Cl. Marcellus the Consull subdued the Gaules inhabiting the Alpes, and C. Sulpitius Gallus the Ligurians. The Embassadors of K. Prusias complained of Eumenes, for that hee invaded and wasted their borders; and they enformed besides, that hee had conspired with Antiochus against the people of Rome. At the earnest suit and entreatie of the Rhodians, a league was contracted with them. The Censors tooke a review and survey of the city, wherein were enrolled and sised 327022 citizens of Rome. M. Aemilius Lepidus was elected president of the Senat. Ptolomeus the king of the Egyptians, was by his younger brother expelled out of his realme, but by the meanes of Embassadors (sent from Rome) he was restored to his kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, his sonne Ariarathes came to the crowne, and by entercourse and mediation of Embassadors renewed amitie with the people of Rome. This booke containeth besides the warres against the Ligurians, Corsians, and Lusitanians, fought with variable fortune: the troubles also in Syria after the death of Antiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his sonne, a very child. This young prince (together with his guardian Lysias) Demetrius the sonne of Seleucus (who had been sent in hostage to Rome) murdered privily, because he was not set at large and dismissed by the Romanes: and so himselfe entred upon the kingdom. L. Aemilius Paulus who had conquered Persus, departed this life; whose incorruption and abstinence from the publicke treasure was such, that notwithstanding he had brought both out of Spaine and Macedonie so great store of wealth and riches, yet when his goods were prized and sold, there would be hardly raised thereof sufficient to repay his wife her dowrie. The Pomptine marshes were drawn drie by Cor. Cethegus the Consull (unto whom that charge was by lot fallen) and the same turned into firme ground.

Of the XLVII. booke.

Cneus Tremellius a Tribune of the Commons had a fine set on his head, for that he had contended in a wrongfull cause with M. Aemilius Lepidus the soweraigne Pontiffe. The power and authoritie of the cleargie magistrates, was greater and mightier than before. A law was enacted as touching inordinate suit for offices. In the survey of the citie, there were taxed in the subsidie booke 328314 Romane citizens. L. Aemilius Lepidus was chosen againe president of the Senat. Betweene the two breethren Ptolomees, who were at variance, there passed this accord and agreement, That the one should reigne in Egypt and the other in Cyrene. Ariarathus king of Cappadocia, by the politick plot & forcible power of Demetrius king of Syria dispossessed of his kingdom, was by the Senat set into it againe. Certain embassadors were sent as delegates from the Senat to determine of the litigious ground betweene Masaniissa and the Carthaginians. C. Martius the Consull fought against the Dalmatians, at the first unfortunatly, but afterwards atchieved the victorie. The occasion of the war with them was this; for that they had madewast upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The same nation Cornelius Nasica the Consull brought in subiection. Q. Opimius the Consull subdued the Ligurians beyond the Alpes, who had spoiled Antipolis and Nicæa, two townes belonging to the seignorie of the Masilians. Moreover here are contained the adventures of many capitaines in Spaine, with no good successe. In the 98 yeere from the foundation of the cittie, the Consuls so soone as the assembly for election was past, & other Consuls chosen for the yeere following, began their office. The cause of this alteration was, because the Spaniards were entred into rebellion. The ambassadors aforesaid who had bene sent to take up and decide the controversie between Masanissa and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great store of ship-timber and other matter for a navie at Carthage. Certaine Pretours accused by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII. booke.

He Censours tooke a review and taxe of the cittie, wherein were reckoned three hundred foure and twentie thousand polls of citizens. The causes of a third Punike war bee here recorded. Upon a report that there was a right puissant armie of Numidians upon the borders of the Carthaginians, conducted by Archobazanes the nephew of Syphax, Marcus Porcius Cato persuaded in an oration to proclaime warre against the Carthaginians, for that they intertained such a power within their frontiers under a colour against Masanissa, but in truth raised against the Romanes: howbeit Publius Cornelius Nasica gauesaid him and dissuaded the matter. Whereupon ordeined it was, that Embassadors should bee sent to Carthage in especiall, to observe what they did, and where-about they went. Who after they had given the Carthaginian Senate a checke and rebuke, for that against the covenants of the league, they mainteined forces, and were provided of timber and other stoffe for a navie, they were willing to conclude a peace betweene Masanissa and them; so as Masanissa should forgoe and part with the land in question. But Gizzo the sonne of Amilcar, a busie and seditious man, who then was souveraigne magistrate (notwithstanding their Senate promised to be ruled by the award of the said embassadors) incited them so by his perswasive remonstrances to warre upon the Romanes, that the embassadors made shift to flee & save themselves, or else they had come to a mischief. When they related these newes at Rome, the Senate already set and bent against the Carthaginians, were now by his words provoked much more. M. Porcius Cato performed the funerals of his sonne, deceased in his Pretourship, with exceeding small charges, according to his abilitie, for he was put poore. One Andronicus, who stoutly made the world believe, that he was the sonne of Pericles the king of Macedonie, was sent to Rome. M. Aemilius Lepidus, now sixe times chosen President of the Senate by the Censours, gave his sonnes in streight charge before he died, to carrie him forth to buriall in a couch without linnen clothes and the purple pall, and not to bestow in either obsequies above one denier, saying that the funerals of the greatest and best personages are wont to be ennobled and honoured with the shewes of images and titles, and not with sumptuous expenses. An inquisition there was about the practise of poisoning and sorcerie. Publilia and Licinia, who were indicted for making away their husbands, put in sureties before the Pretour, to be bound in goods, lands, and bodie for them, and after iudiciall processe passed, and their cause heard, by a decree of their kinsfolke suffered death. Gulusa the sonne of Masanissa gave intelligence, that at Carthage there was mustering and levying of souldiours, rigging and providing of a fleet, all preparations no doubt for warre; and Publius Cornelius Nasica replied againe, that nothing was to bee done inconsiderately, without advise. Thought good it was to send ten embassadors, for to see the truth of all, and upon their knowledge to certifie. L. Licinius Lucullus and Aulus Posthumius Albinus the Consuls, when they tooke musters with severitie and rigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but prest all, were committed by the Tribunes of the commons, who for their friends could obtaine at their hands no release and immunity of souldierie. By occasion of the warres in Spaine, which many times had bene untowardly and unfortunately managed, when the cittie of Rome was so dismayed and daunted, that there could not be found any one who would so much as accept of a martiall Tribuneship, or was willing to goe in quality of lieutenant; Publius Cornelius Aemilianus stepped forth, made offer and professed, that hee would undertake any kind of militarie service whatsoever should bee laid upon him: and by his owne example stirred up all the rest to the love of warfare. L. Lucullus the Consul, when Claudius Marcellus (after whom hee succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the states & nations of Celtiberia, subdued the Vacceans, Cantabrians, and other regions and nations as yet unknowne in Spaine. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Aemilianus, the son of L. Paulus, and the nephew of Africanus by adoption, being there a martiall Colonell, slew a Barbarian challenger that desired him. But in the winning of the cittie Intercatia, hee adventured a more dangerous enterprise: For hee was the first of all other that scaled and mounted over the wall. Servius Sulpitius Galba the Pretour sped but badly in a battaile against the Portugales. When as the embassadors were returned out of Africke, together with the Carthaginian Oratours, and Gulusa the sonne of Masanissa, bringing word, That they found at Carthage both an armie and also an armada; thought good it was, to put to question and debate the matter in the Senate: where Cato and other principall Senatours were of opinion and gave advise, to transport an armie presently into Africke: but because Cornelius Nasica opined and said, That hee saw as yet no iust and sufficient cause of warre, agreed it was to forbear all hostilitie and force of armes, in case the Carthaginians would burne their navie and discharge their armie: if not, then agreed it was, that the Consuls next following in place of government, should propose as touching the Punicke warre. When the Theatre was built, which by the Censours had bene put forth to workemen to frame and set up at a price, through the meanes of Pub. Cornelius Nasica, who inferred, that it was a peece of worke unprofitable yea, and hurtfull to the manners generally of the cittizens; by vertue of an act of Senate demolished it was and pulled downe; so as the people for a long time stood on their feet, to behold the publicke plaies. The Carthaginians at that time tooke armes contrary to the league, and warred upon Masanissa. But waggish they were in field by him (who notwithstanding he now was fourescore yeere old & twelve, yet hee used to tast his meat simply without any deintie sauce, yea, and to chew his bare bread still:) and over and besides they deserved to draw upon their head the Romane warre.

Of the XLIX. booke.

He beginning of the third Punick war, in the six hundredth and one yeere from the cities foundation, which within 5 yeeres after it began, came to a full & final end. Much diversitie there was in opinion between M. Porcius Cato whom they reputed for the wisest, and Scipio Nasica, who by the Senat was iudged the best & honestest man in the city. Cato was altogether for the war, & advised to destroy Carthage quite: Nasica contrariwise dissuaded what he could. Neverthelesse, in the end ordained it was, That because against covenant & accord they kept a navie at sea, & had led forth an armie out of their borders: also for that they entred into armes and levied war upon Masanissa, a friend and confederat to the people of Rome, and received not into their town Gulusa his sonne, who was in the companie of the Romane embassadors; warre should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forces were embarked and had taken the sea, the embassadors of Utica repaired to Rome, yielding themselves and all that they had. That embassage, as a speciall preface to the issue and event of the war, was acceptable and pleasing to the lords of the Senate, but heavie and grievous to the Carthaginians. In Terentium a place it was in Campius Martius, whereupon the pastimes Terentini tooke their name, were plaies exhibited to Father Dis the infernall god, according to the direction of the bookes of Sibylla. These had been set out one hundred yeeres before in the first Punicke war and in the five hundredth yeere and one, after the cittie was founded. Thirtie embassadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their submission. But the sentence of Cato imported and prevailed, to hold still their former determination, and that the Consuls with all speed should set forward their journey to the warre. Who having passed the seas and arrived in Affricke, received of them three hundred hostages, whome they had required and demanded; and also tooke into their hands all their armours and weapons, and what furniture of warre soever they found at Carthage. They proceeded moreover after all this, to commaund them by warrant and authoritie from the L.L. of the Senate to build them a new towne for to inhabite in some other place, so that it were tenne miles at least remote from the sea: by which indignitie offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to rife and take armes againe. L. Martius and M. Manilius the Consuls, began to besiege and assault Carthage: during which siege and assault, it fortuneed that two Colonels unadvisedly adventured to breake into the cittie with their cohorts, at one part thereof where the wals were neglected, & when by the townsmen they were fore beaten and killed, by the meanes of Scipio Africanus they were rescued: by whome also a certein sence and sort of the Romanes, which the enemies by night assailed, with the helpe of a few horsemen was delivered. Moreover hee saved the campe, against which the Carthaginians sallied forth of their their citie to give the assault at once upon it with all their forces; by which service hee above the rest won great honor. Over & besides, when as the Consull for the other was gone to Rome to hold the election of magistrates, seeing the siege and assault of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the armie against Asdruball, who with another power of men kept the narrow streights of a certeine passage, he counselled the said Consull first not to give battell in a place of such disadvantage, but afterwards overweighed and borne downe by the opinions of the greater number (who carried as well his wisdom as vertue) hee also entered into the same streights. And when the Roman armie according as he foretold, was discomfited and put to flight, and two cohorts beset round and invested by the enemies, hee with certeine small cornets of horse returned into those streights, rescued them, and brought them away in safetie. Which valour of his, even Cato, (a man otherwise more readie of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the Senate, that in these terms he gave out and said, * That all the rest who were employed in the warres of Affricke, served as shaddowes and dead men, but Cato had true vigour and spirit indeed. The people of Rome besides cast such a favour and good liking to him, that at the next election, most of the tribes pricked him for to bee Consull, notwithstanding he was by law under age. When L. Scribonius a Tribune of the Commons had promulged a law, That all the Portugals (who according to covenant and composition, yielded to the people of Rome, and yet by Sergius Galba were sold in Fraunce) should be restored to their freedom; M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalfe of that law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be scene, included within his Annales. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, albeis he was by him shaken up and well checked in the Senate, answered in the behalfe of Galba. Yea, and Galba also, seeing himselfe at the point to bee condemned, tooke in his armes and embraced his owne two sonnes; being * Prætextati, and a sonne of Caius Sulpitius whose Guardian hee was, and made such pitteous and rusfull mone, all the while hee spake in his owne cause, that the foresaid law was revoked and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be scene; two against Libo a Tribune of the Commons and his proposed lawes, as touching the Portugals; and one against Lucius Cornelius Cethegus, in which hee confesteth and avoweth the killing of the Portugals, encamped neere unto him: for that hee knew certeinly that they after their manner had sacrificed an hundred a man, and under a colour of peace, intended to set upon and charge his armie. Andrisicus one of base birth and the most abject lowest condition, who made the world believe that hee was king Perseus his son, and thereupon changed his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and fled secretly from Rome (whither Demetrius king of Syria had sent him in regard of this his notorious lie) had many men come flocking unto him, embracing a forged & counterfet fable of his, as if it had bene a true fame and report: by which means hee gathered an armie together, and either with the good will of the inhabitants, or by force of armes, seized all Macedonie and held it in his hands. Now had he devised & framed the pageant in this wise, That Perseus the king had begotten him (forsooth) of a concubine: that he was committed to one Cyrtthesa to bee fostered and brought up: to the end that if ought should fall out but well unto the King in that war which he waged with the Romanes, there might be yet some seed as it were and yssue remaining of the kings blood and royall race. When Perseus was deceased, he had his education at Adamantium until he was 12 yeres old, supposing him to be his naturall father who fostered & kept him, & will not at all from what stocke he was descended. Now it fell out (saith he) that the said foster father of mine lay very sicke; & being at the point of death, bewraied at length my birth & parentage. Moreover, that there was a little book given to my supposed mother, sealed with the signe manuell of king Perseus, which shee was to deliver unto me when I came once to ripe age, and to be 14 yeres old: charging her most straightly of all loves, to conceale the whole matter, untill that time were come: & when I was grown to that age aforesaid, then the book was given mee; wherein mention was made of two chests of treasure left for mee by my father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of hers, but onely so reputed, bewraied my birth unto me, who was of ore time ignorant of mine own descent: also the woman laid great wait upon me to depart out of those quarters before that Eumenes, a professed enemy to Perseus, came to the knowledge thereof, for feare to bee murdered. In which respect I being affrighted, and hoping withall to find some aid at the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria; and there first I tooke heart unto mee, and dared openly to professe who I was and never before. [Thus much of Andrisicus this counterfet kings sonne.]

Of the L. booke.

Heslie at what time as the foresaid counterfet Philip would have invaded and kept it by force of armes, was by the means of the Roman embassadors, together with the aid of the Achæans defended. Prusias king of Bithynia, a favourer of the best persons and lowdest vices, was by his owne sonne Nicomedes murdered, with the helpe of Attalus King of Pergamus. Another son he had, who in stead of the upper row and course of distinct teeth, is reported to have had one entier bone for all growing out at his gums. When the Romans had sent their embassadours to conclude a peace betwene Nicomedes and Prusias; of which embassadours, the one had his head full of many skarres, the other was troubled with the gout in the feet, and the third reputed but blockish of spirit by nature, and none of the wisest; Cato said, That there was an embassage head-lesse, foot-lesse, and hart-lesse. In Syria which at that time had for their king, one indeed of the line & race of Perseus King of Macedonie, but another Prusias up and downe, for cowardise, idleness, and base mind; it so fell out, that whiles he haunted taverns, stewes, and brothelhouses, and lay there altogether, Ammonius swaid the scepter and reigned as King: by whose practise the kings friends, also Loodice the Queene, and Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius came to their end and were killed. Masanissa king of Numidia, a man above fourescore and ten yeeres old, a famous prince and every way excellent, yielded to nature and died. Among other youthfull parts which hee performed to his dying day, this is one, That in this old age of his he was so lastie, that after the fourescore and sixt yeere of his life he got a boy. Among his three sonnes, Mycipsa (the eldest) Gulussa, and Manastabal, who also had good knowledge in the Greeke tongue, Publius Scipio Emilianus divided the administration of the kingdome: for their father had left it in common for them all, and had given order to part it at the discretion of the same Scipio. Likewise he perswaded Phamias the commaunder under Himilco of the Carthaginian Cavallerie, (a valiant warrior and whom the Carthaginians emploied most of all others in service) to revolt with his men of armes and to turne Romane. Of those three embassadors aforesaid, who were sent to Masanissa, Claudius Marcellus was cast away in a tempest upon the sea, and swallowed up of the waves in a ghusl. The Carthaginians murdered in their Counsel-chamber Asdruball nephew of Masanissa, and their Pretour for the time being, upon suspicion of treason. This tealousie of theirs arose hereupon, for that hee was neere in kindred and blood to Gulussa, who friended and succoured the Romanes. Publius Scipio Emilianus when hee sued to be Aedile, was by the people propounded and nominated for Consul: and when as by law he might not for his young yeres be created Consul, hard bold there was about him: whiles the commons laboured with might and maine for him, and the nobles and lords of the Senate gaine said it a good while: but in fine, he was dispensed with, notwithstanding the * law in that behalfe, & created Consul. Marcus Manilius (Pro-consull) forced certaine citties situate about Carthage. * Counterfet Philip, after he had slaine M. Iuventius the Pretor and Q. Cælius, & together with them defeated the armie, was in Macedonie vanquished himselfe and taken prisoner, and so Macedonie was recovered againe which had bene lost before.

Of the L. I. booke.

Carthage, which tooke up in circuite the compasse of foure and twentie miles, was with exceeding paine and travail besieged and won by peece-meale: first under the conduct of At. Metellus the lieutenant; afterwards of Scipio the Consull, unto whom without los the province of Affricke was extraordinarily granted. The Carthaginians having made a new peece (for that the old haven was choked and stopped up by Scipio) and gathered secretly in a small time a good fleet, sought a battaile at sea unfortunately. Moreover the campe of Asdruball their Generall pitched in a place of most difficult access neere the towne Neberis, was forced, and his armie defeated by Scipio: who also in the end won the very cittie of Carthage, in the seven hundred yere after it was first founded. The greatest part of the spoile and pillage there found, was restored to the Sicilians, from whome it had been taken. In the utmost extremitie and finall destruction of that citie, when Asdruball had yielded and submitted to Scipio; his wife (who some daies before could not obtain at her husbands hands to abandon the towne and flie to the conquerour) cast her selfe with her two children headlong from the castle into the mids of the flaming fire, wherewith the citie burned. Scipio, following the example of his father Emilianus Paulus who had conquered Macedonia, set forth certaine solemm plaies and pastimes wherin the the reſcates and fugitives be preſented and obiecte to ſavage beaſts. The cauſes of the Achæan warre bee here reported. The Romane embaiſadours who had bene beaten and ill intreated by the Achæans, were ſent unto Corinth, ſo ſever and diſſaine thoſe citties (which had bene under the ſeignorie of Philip) from the generall diet and parliament of the Achæans.

Of the LI I booke.

Quintus Cæcilius Metellus fought a battaile at Thermopyla with the Achæans, that had to ſaid them the Bæotians and Chalcidians: who being overcome, Critolaus their chiefe captain ſhortned his owne life by poiſon: and in his place * Drachus the firſt authour of the troubles in Achæa, was by the Achæans choſen Generall of the field, and by L. Mummius the Conſull vanquiſhed nere to Iſthmus: who having received all Achæa by ſurrender, raiſed and deſtroied utterly Corinth, by an Act and commiſſion directed out of the Senat; becauſe the Romane embaiſadours were there abuſed. Thebes alſo and Chalcis which had aided the Achæans, were overthrowen and pulled downe. Mummius for his owne part, bare himſelf moſt abſtinent and uncorrupt: for of all that wealth, & thoſe goods and ornaments wherewith Corinth was mightily enriched, there came not one parcell into his houſe. Quintus Cæcilius Metellus triumphed for the conqueſt of Andriſcus, and Publius Cornelius Scipio Affricanus Emilianus likewiſe over Carthage and Aſdruball. Viriatus in Spaine, firſt of an heard-man became an hunter, and of a hunter proved to bee a very theefe and robber: and within a while after, was choſen Generall of a complete and maine armie, and ſeiſed to his owne uſe all Portugall. He took priſoner M. Vitilius the Pretor, when he had firſt diſcomfited his hoſt in the field. After whom C. Plautius the Pretour ſped no better in fight. This enemy ſo terrified the Romanes, that to make head againſt him they found it neceſſarie to employ a full conſular armie, and a Conſull commander. Moreover in this booke be recorded the troubles of Syria and the warres between the kings. * Alexander an obſcure perſon and baſe borne, having ſtaine (as is before ſaid) Demetrius the king, reigned in Syria. Him Demetrius (the ſon of Demetrius) ſlew, by the help of Ptolomeus king of Egypt, whoſe daughter Cleopatra he had eſpouſed and married. This Demetrius in times paſt had bene ſent out of the way to Gordos by his father, fearing the doubtfull chaunces of the war: and he entred upon this action by occaſion of the contemptible ſloth and cowardiſe of the ſaid Alexander. Ptolomeus was grievouſly wounded in the head: and in the cure, whiles the Chirurgicalians went about to * trypanize the bones of his ſkull, died under their hand. And in his ſtead Ptolomeus his younger brother who reigned in Cyrena, ſucceeded and tooke upon him the crowne. Demetrius for his crueltie which he exerciſed upon his people by racking and other torments, was vanquiſhed in battaile by Diodorus, one of his owne ſubiects: who made claime to the kingdome in the right and title of Alexanders ſonne, a young child hardly two yeeres old: whereupon he fled to Seleucia. Lucius Mummius triumphed over the Achæans, in which ſolemnitie he carried in pompeous ſhew ſundrie images as well of braſſe as marble, beſides pictures and painted tables.

Tremellius the treaſurer was with his army defeated and ſlaine. Q. Cæcilius Metellus the Pro-conſul gave the Celtiberians an overthrow. The moſt part of Portugal was regained by Q. Fabius the Pro-conſull, and many citties thereof by aſſault forced. C. Julius a Senator by calling, wrote the Romane hſtorie in the Greeke tongue.

Of the L IIII. booke.

Quintus Pompeius the Conſull ſubdued the Termeſtines in Spaine: with whome verily, as alſo with the Numantines, by occaſion of his infirmities and ſickneſſe, he concluded peace. A review and numbring of the citizens was taken by the Cenſors: wherein were enrolled ſoure hundred twentie eight thouſand, three hundred ſortie two polls. At what time as the Macedonian embaiſadours came to complaine of D. Iunius Syllanus, the lord deputie over them, for that hee tooke their money, and nevertheleſſe made an harooke of the province, and thereupon the Senat was willing to have the hearing of their complaints: T. Manlius Torquatus the father of Syllanus, exhibited a requeſt, and obtained, that the inquirie and deciſion of ſuch a matter as this might bee referred over and committed unto him. And after he had ſitten upon this commiſſion at home in his own houſe and found his ſonne guiltie, he both condemned him and put him away: nay, when afterwards hee had hanged himſelfe, for that was his end, he would not be ſo much as preſent at his funerall, but according to his ordinarie manner and cuſtome, ſat in his houſe, attending all clients and commers to him for counſell. Q. Fabius the Proconſull, after he had managed the warres in Spain right properly, ſmared all with this foule blot and ſpot of diſhonour, in that he contracted a peace with Viriatus, upon even and equal conditions. This Viriatus by a praſtiſe plotted by Servilius Cæpio, was treacherouſly murdered by traitors, and of his own armie was much bewailed. At his death he was rung out of this world with a notable peale of * ſarewell, and right honorably entred: an excellent man, and moſt brave captain for the ſpace of thirteene yeeres, during which time he warred with the Romanes, and ever for the moſt part went away with the winning hand.

Of the L V. booke.

Whiles P. Cornelius Neſica, who by way of mockerie was ſurnamed Serapio, by ſcoffing Curatius a Tribune of the Commons, & D. Iunius Brutus the Conſul took the miſters there happened in the very ſight of the new and raw ſouldior an occurrent of great conſequence, & for example ſake exceeding profitable. For C. Mancinus was iudicially accuſed before the Tribunes of the Commons, for that he had abandoned and forſaken his owne armie in Spaine, whereupon he being convicted, was condemned and ſcourged a long while with rods, carrying a forke or croſſe upon his ſhoulders, and in the end ſold as a ſlave for a ſmall peece of ſilver of * three halfepeece ſarthing due. The Tribunes of the Commons, becauſe they might be allowed to exempt from militarie ſervice tenne ſouldiors apeece, whom it pleaſed them to choſe, commaunded the Conſuls to priſon Iun. Brutus the Conſul, whiles he was in Spaine, ended thoſe ſoldiors who had ſerved under Viriatus with land and living, and gave them a towne to inhabit called Valentia. M. Popilius, together with his armie was ſoiled and put to the rout by the Numantines, with whom the peace that was concluded, the Senat had paſſed an act, that it ſhould not ſtand in force. The occaſion was this: As C. Mancinus the Conſul was devoutly ſacrificing, the ſacred chickens chaunced to flie away out of their cage or coupe. Afterwards, as he was about to take ſea and goe a ſhipboord for to paſſe over into Spain, there happened a voice to be heard, ſaying, Stay, stay. Mancinus. Theſe proved in the effect to be unfortunate and heavey preſages unto Mancinus, for he received an overthrow at the Numantines hands, and was turned cleane out of his camp. And ſeeing no hope els to ſave his armie, he entred into a diſhonorable peace with them, but the Senat expreſſly revoked and annulled the ſame. 30000 Romanes were defeated by 4000 Numantines & no more. D. Iunius made a generall conqueſt of all Portugall, even as far as to the Ocean, by forcing and ſacking their citties and ſtrong townes: and when his ſoldiors were loth to paſſe over the river * Obliſio, hee caught up a banner from the port-enſigne, and carried it over with him, and by this means perſuaded them to go through. Alexanders ſon, king of Syria, a child not above ten yeeres old at the moſt, was treacherouſly murdered by Diodorus his guardian or proteſtor ſurnamed Tryphon. There were phyſicians by corruption bribed & ſuborned to give it out and beare the people in hand moſt falſly, that the young prince pined away with the paine of the ſtone in the bladder, and whiles they would ſeeme to cut him for it, they killed him out of hand in the very ſection.

Of the L VI. booke.

Decius Iunius Brutus had good fortune in the farther province of Spaine, fighting with the Gullicians. But M. Emilius Lepidus pro-conſull ſped far otherwiſe in his wars againſt the Vaccei, and ſuffered the like overthrow to that other received from the Numantines. When Mancinus the authour and maker of the accord with the Numantines, was delivered up in perſon to the Numantines, for to aſſoile the people of Rome, & diſcharge them in conſcience for cancelling the ſaid covenant, they received him not, & would none of him. The people was numbred & taxed by the Cenſors: in which ſurvey & account taken, there were entred into their books 323000 Roman citizens. Fulvius Flaccus the Coſ. brought the Pardeans in Illyricum under ſubjection. M. Coſconius the Pretor fought in Thracia with the Scordiaſians, & won the better. When by the default and error of the captains and commanders, the Numantine war continued ſtill, not without the publick ſhame and diſhonor of the ſtate, the Senat and people of Rome conferred the Conſulſhip upon Scipio Affricanus, without any ſuit or ſeeking of his

Scipio Africanus laid siege to Numantia: and whereas the armie was grown to be corrupted through ... with variable fortune and event.

Of the LIX. booke.

The Numantines forced by great extremities, and of famine especially, murdered themselves in ... course by turnes. After the citie was woon, Scipio Africanus rased and destroyed it utterly: & over
 ... it triumphed, in the fourteenth yeere after the ruine of Carthage. P. Atilius the Consull dispatched
 ... and ended the warre in Sicilie, with the foresaid fugitives. Aristonicus the sonne of king Eumenes, in... vaded Asia and held it to his owne use: whereas by the last will and testament of king Attalus, it was
 ... bequeathed as a legacie unto the people of Rome and ought to have ben freed. Against him, P. Lucinius
 ... Crassus the Consull & Archbishopp besides (a thing never done or seene before) took a iourney with an ar-
 ... mie out of Italic, and in a batell was overthrowne and lost his life. M. Perpenna the Consull overcame
 ... Aristonicus, and received him by surrender. Q. Pomponius and Q. Metellus were elected Censors the ... first Commoners that ever both together attained to that dignitie. A review was taken by the Censors,
 ... wherein were numbred 368823 citizens, besides orphans and widows. Q. Metellus the Censor gave his ... advise and opinion, that all men should be compelled to take wives, for the breeding of children. His O-
 ... ration to that purpose is extant: which Augustus Caesar at what time as he went in hand to joine in ma-
 ... riage all the three states and degrees of the citie, rehearsed in the Senate, as if it had bene penned to fit
 ... these times wherein we now live. C. Atinius Labeo, a Tribune of the Commons, commaunded Q. Metel-
 ... lus the Censor (who in the review and new choise of the Senators did him that disgrace as to have him ... out) to be pitched down headlong from the rock Tarpeia: but the rest of the Tribunes assisted the Censor
 ... all that ever they could, that this commaundement should not be executed. When Carbo, a Tribune of ... the Com. proposed a bill, that it might be lawfull to create the same man Trib. of the Commons so often ... as one would: P. Africanus dissuaded this law in a most grave and pithy Oration: wherein hee used these ... words especially, That hee iudged Tib. Gracchus to have ben unjustly slaine for his deserts. Gracchus on the ... other side maintained the law, and pleaded that it might passe: but Scipio imported and prevailed in the ... end. In this booke are related the wars betweene Antiochus king of Syria, & Phraates king of the Par-
 ... thians: as also the troubles of Egypt, which stood as then in no better terms. Ptolomaeus surnamed Ever-
 ... getes for his exceeding crueltie grew hatefull and odious to his owne subjects: and when the people had ... set on fire and burned his roiall pallace, he fled by stealth into Cyprus: & when the kingdome was by the ... people made over to his sister Cleopatra whom (after hee had deflowered by force her daughter, a virgin,
 ... and so taken her to wife) he had turned away in great displeasure and malice unto her, he killed that son
 ... whom he had by her in Cyprus, & sent unto the mother his head, hands and feet. Certain seditions were ... raised by the Triumvirs, Fulvius Flaccus, C. Gracchus, and L. Carbo, who were created for the decifi-
 ... on of land. Against whom P. Scipio Africanus made resistance: but being in perfect health strong and ... lustie, he went home to his house as it might bee to day, and was found dead in his bedchamber the next ... morning. His wife Sempronius was deeply suspected to have given him a cup of poison: & hereupon especi... ally, because she was sister to the Gracchi, between whom and Africanus there was grudge and enmitie.
 ... Howbeit, there was no question and streight enquire made how hee came to his death. When his head ... was once laid, the Triumvir all seditions foresaid, brake forth into a more light & hot fire. C. Sempro-
 ... nius the Consull fought against the Tarpide, first unfortunately, but soon after he made amends for that ... losse received, with a victorie achieved by the special valor of C. Iunius Brutus, the same man who be... fore had conquered Portugall.

Of the LX. booke.

A Prelius the Consull subdued the Sardians. Fulvius Flaccus was the first man that vanquished
 ... in fight the Ligurians beyond the Alpes, being sent to aid the Massilians against the French
 ... Sabes, who lay sore upon the borders of the Massilians, and spoiled them. Lucius Optimus the Pretour, ... received under his subiection the Fregellanes who had revolted, and destroyed the towne Fregella.
 ... N n n n n j Here

Here is reported a pestilence in Affric, by an exceeding multitude of locusts killed and lying dead afterwards upon the ground. A survey was taken of the citie by the Censors, wherein were numbered 39 or 36 citizens: C. Gracchus, brother of Tyberius, a Tribune of the Commons: but of the twain more eloquent, preferred certain dangerous and pernicious laws: & among the rest, one as touching grain, namely, that the Commons should be served in the market at the rate of one halfe, and a third part of * Ase, a Modd is; another, concerning division of lands, the same which his brother before him had published, and a third (whereby hee meant to corrupt the order of gentlemen, which then accorded with the degree of Senatus) namely, that from out of those gentlemen, 600 should be taken into the Senat: & for as much as in those daies there were but three hundred Senators, those six hundred gentlemen should be entering in: and with the said three hundred; that is to say, that the order of gentlemen should be double in number to the Senators, and twice as strong. This Gracchus having continued his Tribuneship another yeere, by proposing still the Agrarian lawes prevailed, that many Colonies more should bee planted in Italie, and one besides, upon the very plot of ground where Carthage lately destroyed, had stood: and there himselfe (chosen Triumvir therefore) erected a Colonie. Moreover, this booke containeth the exploits of Q. Ateilius against those Balear Islands, which the Greekes call Gyneresia, because the people go naked all the summer time. But Balears they be named either of *slinging darts, or of Bakus the companion of Hercules, whom he left behind there, at what time as he sailed to Geryon. Also, the troubles in Syria be here reported, wherein Cleopatra slew both her husband Demetrius and his sonne Seleucus, taking great indignation, than when his father was by her killed, hee without her warrant had taken the diademe upon him.

Of the LXI. booke.

 Aius Sextius the Proconsull, after he had conquered the nation of the Salves, built the Colonie Aque Sextie, so called of the plentiful abundance of waters, by reason of springs both hote and cold, and also of his owne name. C. Corn. the Proconsull fought fortunately against the Allobroges, neere the town: *Findalum. The cause why hee levied warre against them was, for that they had received and received by all meanes they could, Teutomalius the king of the *Saboy when he fled unto them, and had wrested a/so the territories of the *Heduns, who were the allies of the people of Rome. C. Gracchus, after he had borne his Tribuneship with much sedition, and kept the Aventine hill with a multitude of the Commons in armes, was by L. Opimius the Consull (who by vertue of an act of Senatus had put the people in armes) disarmed of his hold and slaine; and together with him Fulvius Flaccus a Consular man, his associate and companion in this furious outrage. Q. Fabius Maximus the Consull, and nephew of P. Aulus won a field of the Allobroges, and Bituitus king of the Arverni. Of Bituitus his sonne were slain a hundred and twentie thousand. And when himselfe in person was gone to Rome to satisfy the Senate, he was committed to ward in Alba, for that it seemed dangerous and hurtful to the peace, for to send him backe againe into France. Also there passed a decree, that Congentius his sonne should be apprehended and sent to Rome. The Allobroges submitted and were received. L. Opimius being accused before the bodie of the people by Q. Decius a Tribune of the Commons, for imprisoning certaine citizens uncondemned, was acquit.

Of the LXII. booke.

C. Aius Marius the Consull vanquished the Stonij, a people dwelling upon the Alpes. Micipsa, king of the Numidians died, and left the kingdome unto his three sonnes, Adherbal, Hyempsal, and Iugurtha his brother: sonne whom he had adopted for his owne child. L. Caelius Metellus subdued the Dalmatians, Iugurtha levied warre upon Hyempsal his brother, overcame him in fight, and slew him: Adherbal his third brother, hee drove out of the realme, but by the Senate of Rome restored he was againe. L. Caelius Metellus, and Cn. Demetrius Ahenobarbus the Censors, deprived two and thirtie Senators of their place and dignitie. Besides, this booke containeth the troubles of the Syrian kings.

Of the LXIII. booke.

C. Aius Porcius Cato the Coss, fought with the *Scordisci in Thracia, & lost the field. The Censors took a survey of the citie: in which were enrolled 394336 pols of Roman citizens. Aemylia, Licinia, & Marcia, Marcia, three vesall virgines were convicted and condemned for incest. The manner how this their fornication was committed, detected, iudged, and punished, is here set down. The *Cimbrians, an huge and mightie nation, invaded Illyricum and put it to the wast: by whom Papirius Carbo the Consull was defeated, both he and his armie. L. Aius Drusus the Consull, warred in Thracia upon the Scordisci, (a people descended from the Gaules) and won much honour.

Of the LXIII. booke.

 Iugurtha warred upon by Iugurtha, was within the citie Cirta besieged, and by him slaine, notwithstanding the commaundment of the Senate to the contrary. For which cause warre was proclaimed against Iugurtha himselfe. Calpurnius Bestia had the commission & charge to manage this warre: who made peace with Iugurtha, without warrant from the people and Senate. Iugurtha being cited and called forth under safe-conduct, to appeach and bewray the authors of his plots & designs, for that the voice went that he had bribed and corrupted with summes of money many of the Senat, came to Rome: where he was in trouble and icopardie for a murder committed upon the person of a certaine prince called Masinissa (who seeing him to be hated of the Romans, sought for his kingdome) whom hee slew at Rome. Being commaunded to answer for his life in regard of this murder, he secretly fled, and as he departed from the citie, uttered (by report) these words, O corrupt citie and set to sale, how soone will it perish, if it may meet with a chapman? A. Posthumus a lieutenant Generall, after he had likewise fought an unfortunat battaile against Iugurtha, amended the matter full well, by making an ignominious and dishonourable peace with him, which the Senat iudged not meet to be observed and kept.

Of the LXV. booke.

 C. Aius Caelius Metellus the Consull in two battailes discomfited Iugurtha and over-ran all Numidia. M. Iun. Syllanus the Consull sped unluckily in a battaile fought against the Cimbrians: whose embassadours demanding of the Senate a place of habitation and lands to occupy, were denied. M. Minutius Pro-consull, had good successe in fight against the *Thracians. L. Cassius, the Consull together with his host, was defeated and cut in peeces in the borders of the Allobroians by the French Tigrines, a country of the *Helvetians, who had divided themselves & were departed from the rest of the State. Theouldiours remaining alive after that overthrow, capitulated with the enemies for safetie of their lives, to put in pledges for to part with the one moiety of all that ever they had, unto them.

Of the LXVI. booke.

 Iugurtha driven out of Numidia by C. Marius, had the helpe and aid of Bocchus king of the Moors: but when the power of Bocchus also was defeated in battaile, and himselfe unwilling to maintaine the warre any longer (so unfortunately begun) Iugurtha was overcome, and delivered up to C. Marius. In which exploit the service of L. Cornelius Sylla treasurer unto Marius, was singular above the rest.

Of the LXVII. booke.

 P. Scaurus lieutenant to the Consull, was with his armie overthrowne by the Cimbrians, and himselfe taken prisoner. When by them he was called forth to counsell (at what time as they intended a voiage into Italie) in which he seemed to fright them for passing over the Alpes, saying, That the Romanes might not possibly be overcome, he was by Bolus their king aproud and fierce prince, killed. At the same enemies hands Cn. Manlius Cef. and Q. Servilius Capio, Pro-consul, received an overthrow in the field and lost both their camps. Slaine there were fourescore thousandouldiours: of porters, scullians, landers, and such followers of the camp besides, fortie thousand. By the verdict and censure of the people of Rome, Capio (through whose rashnes this losse and overthrow hapned) was condemned: and he was the first after king Tarquine whose goods were confiscated and finally deprived he was of his government. In the triumph of C. Marius, Iugurtha with his two sonnes was led before his chariot: and afterwards murdered in prison. Marius entered into the Senat, with his triumphant mantell of estate, which never any man before him had done, & for feare of the Cimbrians war he continued in his magistracie many yeeres together. To his second and third Consulship hee was chosen *absent, and hee attained to be Consull the fourth time: which hee gaped for, albeit hee dissembled the contrarie, C. Domitius was by the suffrages of the people created the chiefe Pontific. The Cimbri, ns having laid wast all the partes about the river Rhodanus and the mountaine Pyreneus, passed over into Spaine through the streights: where after they had spoiled many places, they were by the Celtiberians chused away: and being returned into France, they ioyned with the *Teutones, a warlike nation.

Marcus Antonius the Pretour persecuted the rovers at sea, and chased them as far as into Cilicia. C. Manlius the Consul manfully defended the campe, assailed with all most forcible means by the Teutones and *Ambrones. Afterwards in two battailes one after another about *Aque Sextie, hee utterly defeated those enemies: where (by report) were slaine two hundred thousand, & nine thousand taken prisoners. Marius in his absence was created Consul now the first time: and when a triumph was offered unto him, he differed and put it off, untill he had made a full and finall conquest also of the Cimbrians. The Cimbrians repelled and drave from the Alpes Q. Catulus the Pro-consull, who had beset the narrow gullies of the Alpes, and kept a castle highly mounted over the river Athesis, which he now abandoned: and when by their valor they had cleared the passage, they pursued the Pro-consull with his armie and passed over into Italie, where in battaile they were overthrowne by the same Catulus and C. Marius, who had ioyned their forces together. In which (they say) one hundred and forty thousand men were slaine, and 60000 taken prisoners. Marius was honourably received at his returne with a generall accord of the whole cittie: and whereas two triumphes were offered unto him, hee was content with one. The principall peeres and nobles of the cittie, who a long time before had envied him as a man newly start up, risen, and advaunced to so great honours, confessed now that the common weale by him was preserved. Publius Metellus for murdering his owne mother, was the first man sowed up in a leather bag and so throwne into the sea. Here is recorded how the sacred shields Ancilia stirred of themselves with a great rustling noise before the Cimbrians warre was finished. Finally this booke comprehendeth the warres betwene the two kings of Syria.

Of the LXX. booke.

* Numinus.

Cneus Apuleius Saturninus, by the helpe of C. Marius, and by occasion that A. Nonius his competitor and concurrent was by his souldiours slaine, was by forcible meanes created Tribune of the commons, and bare the Tribuneship as violently as he gat it. And when he had proposed an Agrarie law and passed it by force, he arrested Metellus Numidicus to answer it at a day, for that he had not subscribed & sworn to the said law: who being maintained and defended by the citizens of the better sort, because he would give none occasion of unseemly debates and evill contentions, went in voluntarie exile to Rhodes: and there he employed his time in reading of bookes, and giving audience to great and famous men. After he was departed, C. Marius the chieftaine and authour of that sedition, who now had purchased a sixth Consulship by a largesse of money skambled amongst the tribes, proclaimed him as excommunicate and enterdicted from fire and water like an outlaw. The same Apuleius Saturninus Tribune of the commons, slew C. *Memmius in his white gowne standing to be Consul, for that he feared him above all others to crosse his proceedings: whereupon the Senat was exceedingly moved in the cause and behalf of C. Memmius: and when C. Marius a man by nature mutable, & in his counsaile variable, one who ever loved to be on the better side of the hedge and to band with the mightier, was not able to beare him out and protect him, the said Saturninus together with Glauca the Pretour & other his complices in that outrage, was slain by one Rabirius. Q. Cecilius Metellus was recalled out of banishment with exceeding great love and favour of the whole cittie. Manius Aquilius the Pro-consull dispatched and ended the slaves-warre raised in Sicilie.

Of the LXX. booke.

VVhen Manius Aquilius should plead his owne defence, or answer in case of extortion, hee would not himselfe intreat and crave the favour of the Iurie. But M. Antonius his advocate, who pleaded for him at the bar, sit his coat downe along his brest, to shew the honorable skarres received in the forefront of his bodie: which being by the Iudges seen, they made no doubt, but but acquit him. Of this thing Cicero is the onely outbourn. Didius the Pro-consull mannaed his wars against the Celtiberians, happily. Ptolomeus K. of Cyrene surnamed Apion, when he died, left the people of Rome his heire: & the Senat ordained that the cities of his realme should be free. Ariobarzanes was restored to his kingdome of Cappadocia, by L. Cornelius Sylla. The Parthian embassadours sent from their R. Arsaces came unto Sylla, to treat and sue for amitie with the people of Rome. P. Rutilius a man of uncorrupt and innocent life, who (being lieutenant under L. Mucius the Pro-consull) had defended Asia from the wrongful dealings of the Publicans or common farmers (being odious to the order of knightbood or gentlemen of Rome, who now as Iudges had the iurisdiction in their hands) was condemned for extortion and banished. C. Geminus the Pretor fought untowardly against the Thracians. The Senat would no longer abide the unrulines and wilfull abuses committed by the gentlemen in exercising of their iurisdiction, and therefore began by all meanes possible to endeavour, for to reduce and translate that prerogative again to themselves: in which enterprise M. Livius Drusus a Tribune of the commons stood in their behalfe: who to gain more strength to the cause, raised the commons by proposing unto them a pernicious hope of a largesse. Moreover in this booke are comprised the sturres and troubles of the kings in Syria.

Of the LXXI. booke.

Marcus Livius Drusus a Tribune of the commons, for the better maintenance of the Senates cause, which he had undertaken, solicited the allies and the nations of Italie, upon hope to bee enfranchised citizens of Rome: by whose assistance having gone through by strong hand, with the Agrarian and Frumentarian lawes, hee obtained also the foresaid Law Iudicialis, in this manner, That all iudgements should passe indifferently and equally by Senat and gentlemen. After this, when the freedome of Rome promised to the allies could not bee compassed and performed, the Italians in a chafe and heat of choler began to complot how to revolt: whose conventicles, conspiracies, and orations delivered in the assemblies and diets of their princes, are in this booke reported: In regard whereof, Livius Drusus became hatefull even to the Senate, as the author of a sociall warre, and in his owne house was murdered, but by whom God knoweth.

Of the LXXII. booke.

The Italian states revolt, namely the Picents, Vestines, Marsians, Pelignians, Marrucines, Lucanes, and Samnites. The Picents first entred into armes and began the warre. Quintus Servilius the Pro-consull was slaine in Asculum, together with all the Romane citizens which were in that towne: whereupon the whole people of Rome put on armes and souldiours coats. Servius Galba being surprised by the Lucanes, escaped captivitee by the meanes of one woman, in whose house he toke up his lodging. Esernia and Alba two colonies, were by the Italians besieged. After this, heere are reported the aids of the Latines and other forreine nations sent unto the people of Rome: moreover the expeditions and alternative winning of citties, as well by the one side as the other.

Of the LXXIII. booke.

Lucius Caesar the Consul, in a battaile against the Samnites went downe and had the worse. Nola the colonie fel into the hands of the Samnites, together with L. Posthumus the Pretour, who there was slain. Many more nations revolted to the enemies for that P. Rutilius the Consul had fought with lose against the Marsians, and lost his life in the battaile. C. Marius his lieutenant had a better conflict with the enemies in the end and upshot. Servius Sulpitius vanquished the Pelignians. Q. Capio another lieutenant of Rutilius, who having bin by the enemies besieged, had sallied forth upon the enemies & gotten the upper hand: for this good successe he was made equall in government & command with C. Marius. But heereupon he grew to bee too rash, and being over-taken by an ambush of the enemies, was slaine, and the armie defeated. L. Caesar the Consul wooon a field of the Samnites: for which victorie the souldiours coats were laid off againe at Rome. Yet because the fortune of the field would shew her selfe variable, the colonie Esernia together with M. Marcellus, was taken by the Samnites. On the other side, Marius in a battaile vanquished the Marsians, and slew Hirminus Asinnius the Pretour of the Marrucines. C. Cecilius overcame the Salvij that rebelled in that province of Gaule beyond the Alpes.

Of the LXXIII. booke.

Neus Pompeius discomfited the Picents in battaile and he'd them besieged: for which victorie the embroidered purple robes, with other ornaments and badges of the magistrates were taken up againe and put on. C. Marius fought against the Marsians with doubtfull event. The libertines then and neuer before, began to serve in the warres. Aurelius Plotius the lieutenant in a battaile overcame the Umbrians: likewise L. Porcius the Pretor vanquished the Marsians, when as both these nations had rebelled. Nicomedes was placed againe in the kingdome of Bithynia, and Ariobarzanes of Cappadocia. Cn. Pompeius the Consull overthrew the Marsians in a fight field. When the cittie was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, A. Sempronius Asellus the Pretour, because he gave sentence respectiue in the fauour of the debtours, was slaine in the market place by their creditors the usurers. Moreover this booke relateth the inrodes & invasions of the Thracians into Macedonie, together with their wasting of those parts.

Of the LXXV. booke.

Aulus Posthumius Albinus a lieutenant generall, being the Admirall of a fleet, was upon an infamous imputation of betraying his soldiers massacred by his own army. L. Cornelius Sylla a lieutenant overthrew the Samnites in fight, and woon two campes of theirs. Cn. Pompeius received the Vestines upon their submission. L. Porcius the Consull, after fortunate successe in battaile, and that he had sundrie times discomfited the Samnites, as he assayed to force their campe lost his life: which accident gave away the victorie of that battaile to the enemy. Cosconius and Luccius overcame the Samnites in battaile, slew Marius Egnatius a most noble and renowned commander of the enemies, and had many of their townes surrendered up into their hands. L. Sylla tamed the Hirpines, and defeated the Samnites in many battailes: and certaine States submitted unto him: who having achieved so worthe and brave exploits before his Consulship (as seldome any other man besides, the like) repaired to Rome for to sue to be Consull.

Of the LXXVI. booke.

Aulus Gabinius a lieutenant, having fought fortunately against the Lucanes, and woon from them many townes: as he laid siege to the enemies leaguer was cut off and slaine. Sulpitius in qualitie of lieutenant had the execution of the Marrucines, and the surrender of that whole nation. Cn. Pompeius the Pro-consull tooke the submission of the Vestines and Pelignians. The Marsians likewise having bene in certaine battailes quelled by L. Murana & Caelius Pinna lieutenants, craved peace. Asculum was woon by Cn. Pompeius: and the Italian people by Mamercus Emylius the lieutenant were put to the sword. Silo Popedius, Generall of the Marsians, and the author of this villanie was slaine in battaile. Ariobarzanes of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes of Bithynia were driven both out of their kingdomes, by Mithridates king of Pontus. Last of all, this booke discouerseth of the incursions and spoile that the Thracians made in Macedonie.

Of the LXXVII. booke.

When P. Sulpitius a Tribune of the commons, by the aduise and instigation of C. Marius had promulged certaine pernicious laws, that the banished should be restored, and new citizens together with Libertines be sorted into Tribes: also that Marius should be chosen Generall against Mithridates king of Pontus: and when he offered violence against Q. Pompeius and L. Sylla the Consuls, who contradicted his proceedings: and had slaine the sonne of Pompeius the Consull, who had married Syllaes daughter: then L. Sylla Consull, entred Rome with an army, and within the very cittie fought against the aduerser side of Sulpitius and Marius, and drave them forth: of which faction twelve were by the Senate iudged enemies, and amongst them C. Marius both father and sonne. As for P. Sulpitius, when he lurked in a certaine ferme-house of the countrie, was bewraied & betrayed by his own bond-servant: and so pulled forth from thence and killed. The slave, because he might seem to be rewarded for revealing his maister according to promise, was manumised and set free: but for his his wicked treacherie in betraying his owne maister, he was throwne downe the rocke Tarpeia. C. Marius the sonne crossed the sea into Affricke. C. Marius the father lay hidden amongst the marshes of the Minturnians, and was plucked out from thence by the townesmen: and when a certaine bondslave and a Frenchman borne, was sent to kill him, he was so affrighted at the maiestic and countenance of so brave a man, that he went backe and would not doe the feat: whereupon Marius was embarked at the charges of the cittie, and carried into Affricke. L. Sylla reformed the State of the cittie, and drew out from thence inhabitants to people the colonies. Q. Pompeius the Consull, tooke his iourney to receive the armie of Cn. Pompeius the Cos. and by his counsell was slain. Mithridates king of Pontus setled upon Bithynia and Cappadocia: drave out Aquilius the lieutenant, and with a mightie armie invaded Phrygia the province of the people of Rome.

Mithridates held Asia with his garrisons: he cast into prison Q. Oppius the Pro-consull, and likewise Aquilius the lieutenant. Also by his commandement, all the Romane citizens to bee found in Asia, were in one day massacred. The cittie Rhodes, which onely continued true and kept allegiance, hee assailed: but being in certaine battailes at sea overcome, hee gave over and retired. Archelaus a chiefe governour and commander under the king, entred Greece with an army, seized upon Athens and held it. Moreover, this booke conteineth the fearefull troubles of certaine cities and lands: whiles the inhabitants endeouored to draw their states, some to side with the king, others, to take part with the Romanes.

Of the LXXIX. booke.

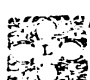

Lucius Cornelius Cinna, at what time as by force and armes hee published dangerous laws, was thereupon by his Colleague Cn. Octavius, driven out of the cittie with sixe Tribunes of the commons besides: and being thus deprived of his rule and authoritie, he became commander of Ap. Claudius his armie by corruption: and ioyning with C. Marius & other banished persons, out of Affricke hee marched in warlike manner against the cittie of Rome. In which war, it fortuneed that two brethren, the one of Pompeius his armie and the other of Cinnaes, encountered in fight and knew not one another. Now when the conquerour was in disarming and spoiling him whom he had slaine, he saw what he had done, and tooke knowledge that it was his brother: whereupon hee fell into an exceeding piteous fit of wailing and lamentation: made a funerals for his brothers corps, stabbed himselfe through thereupon, and in the same fire was burnt and consumed to ashes. Now whereas these civil warres might have bene suppressed in the beginning: such was the fraudulent dealing of Cn. Pompeius, who seeming to mainteine both parties, gave strength to Cinna, and set not to his helping hand, before that the Nobles side went down: such also was the faintnes and coldnes of the Consull, that Cinna and Marius tooke heart and grew strong: and so with foure armies, whereof two were committed to the conduct of Q. Sertorius and C. Carbo, they invested the cittie of Rome. Marius won by force the colonie Ostia, and most cruelly ransacked it.

Of the LXXX booke.

The Italian nations were by the Senat enfranchised, and obtained the freedome of Rome. The Samnites who onely continued in armes handed againe with Cinna and Marius. By them was Plancius slaine and his armie defeated. Cinna and Marius together with Carbo and Sertorius were possessed of Iaviculum, and being discomfited and repelled by Octavius the Consull, retired and departed. Marius spoiled and laid desolate Arimium, Aricia, & Lavinium three colonies. When as now the nobilitie and L. of the Senate had no hope at all left to withstand the contrary faction, by reason of the cowardise and treacherie as well of souldiours as leaders, who upon corruption either would not fight at all, or else went over to the aduerser part: Cinna and Marius were received into Rome: who as if it had bene an enemy-cittie forced by assault, made havocke of all with sacceage and massacres. In this garboile Cn. Octavius the Consull lost his life, and all the nobilitie of the other side were murdered: and among the rest, M. Antonius a most eloquent oratour, and C. Caesar: whose beads were set upon the pulpit Rostra. Tong Crassus the sonne was by the horsemen of Fimbria killed: and Crassus the father, because he would not endure any indignitie unworthie his vertue, fell upon his owne sword. Without any assembly or election at all, L. Cinna and C. Marius declared themselves Consuls for the next yeere: and the same day whereon they entered into their magistracie, Marius caused Sex. Licinius a Senator, to bee throwne downe the rocke Tarpeia: and after many wicked and heinous outrages committed upon the Ides of Ianurie, he departed out of this world: a man whose vices (if they were weighed together with his vertues) hardly could it be determined, whether he were in warre a better souldiour, or in peace a more daungerous citizen. For the common weale which hee in his armour saved, the same in his long gowne hee overthrew, first, with all manner of censure and deceit; and last, by plaine hostilitie and force of armes.

Of the LXXXI. booke.

 Mithridates straightly beleaguered Athens, which Archelaus a governour under king Mithridates held with a garrison: and after much toile and labour wan it. To the citie hee granted their libertie againe and restored unto the citizens all that was their own. Magnesia the onely citie in Asia that remained true and loyal, was most valiantly defended against Mithridates. Over and besides, here yeshall read the exploits performed by the Thracians in Macedonia.

Of the LXXXII. booke.

Sylla vanquished in battaile the power of king Mithridates, which having kept Macedonia in obedience, was now come into Thracia. He slew one hundred thousand enemies, and was master of the campe. Afterwards, when the war was renewed, hee discomfited and defeated quite the kings whole armie. Archelaus together with the kings fleet yeelded to Sylla. L. Valerius Flaccus the Consull & companion in government with Cinna, being sent to succede Sylla, was (for his covetousnesse) so odious unto his armie, that he was slaine by C. Fimbria his owne lieutenant, a most audacious and desperate person: and so the conduct and command of the armie was translated to Fimbria. Moreover, here is recorded what cities in Asia Mithridates wan; how cruelly hee spoiled and vexed the province; and how the Thracians made rodes and invasions into Macedonia.

Of the LXXXIII. booke.

Caius Fimbria after hee had discomfited certaine forces of Mithridates, wan the citie Pergamus; besieged the king there, & missed but a little of taking him prisoner. The citie Ilion, which stood out & reserved it selfe to the behoufe & devotion of Sylla, he forced and destroyed, and the greater part of Asia he recovered. Sylla in many battailes defeated the Thracians. When L. Cinna and C. Papyrius Carbo (who for two yeeres together were Consuls of their own making) prepared war against Sylla; by the meanes of L. Valerius Flaccus the President of the Senate (who made an oration in the Counsell-house) and those who loved concord and sought for amitie, effected it was in the end, that embassadours should be sent unto Sylla, to treat about a peace. Cinna was murdered by his owne souldiours, whom hee forced against their wils to be embarked and to take a voiage against Sylla: by which occasion Carbo alone bare the Consulship. Sylla being passed over into Asia, made peace with Mithridates upon this capitulation, That the king should quit these provinces, namely, Asia, Bithynia, and Cappadocia. Fimbria being forsaken of his owne armie, which revolted unto Sylla, gave himselfe a sore wound, and yielding his neck unto his owne bondslave, obtained this favour at his hands, as to dispatch him outright.

Of the LXXXIII. booke.

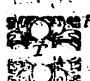

Sylla returned this answere unto the embassadours sent unto him from the Senate, That he would bee ordered by them, in case those citizens who upon the hard usage of Cinna fled unto him, might be restored. The Senate thought this a reasonable condition & a iust demand: but by means of Carbo and that faction, who made reckoning that warre would bee more commodious unto them, there ensued no agreement and accord. The same Carbo when he was minded to exact hostages of all the the towres and colonies of Italie, thereby to bind them upon their allegiance against Sylla, was by a general consent of the Senate crossed and inhibited. The new enfranchised citizens, by vertue of an act by the Senate granted, were allowed the priviledges of their suffrages and voices. Q. Metellus Pius, who had sided with the nobilitie, whiles he levied warre in Affricke was by C. Fabius the Pretour discomfited: and by the faction of Carbo and those that followed the part of Marius, an Act of Senat passed, That all armies and forces where(ever should be raised and discharged. The Libertines were distributed indifferently throughout the five and thirtie tribes. Besides all this, here is specified the preparation of warre which was raised against Sylla.

Of the LXXXV. booke.

Sylla crossed the seas with an armie over into Italie: and when those embassadours which hee sent to treat for peace, were by the Consull C. Norbanus evilly intreated, he overcame the said Norbanus in a battaile. And when he was about to assaile the campe of L. Scipio the other Consull, with whom hee had prevailed and assured all meanes to conclude peace, and could not compass it, the whole armie of the Consull in general, being solicited by souldiours whome Sylla had sent out under hand to that purpose, turned their ensignes unto him, and followed his slander. Scipio, when hee thought have bene killed was let go. Cn. Pompeius the sonne of that Cneus who wonne Asculum, enrolled an armie of voluntaries, and came unto Sylla with three legions: unto whom also the nobilitie all and whole ranged themselves, as abandoning the citie they repaired to the campe. Finally in this booke report is made of the expeditions performed by captaines of both sides, throughout all Italie.

Of the LXXXVI. booke.

 That yeere, wherein C. Marius (the sonne of C. Marius) was by forcible meanes and strong hand created Consull before he was twentie yeeres of age; C. Fabius in Affricke was burnt quicke in his owne pyre, for his bloudie crueltie and greedie avarice. L. Philippus lieutenant unto Sylla, seized Sardinia, after he had discomfited and slaine Q. Antonius the Pretour. Sylla contracted a league with the States of Italie, to put them out of feare that he would not bereave them of their freedome of Rome and libertie of suffrages, lately granted unto them. In like manner, upon assured confidence (that he had already of undoubted victorie, he commanded all those that were in suite and resorted unto him for iurisdiction, to adourn their apparance in court, and to appeare at Rome. Whiles the citie yet was divided and distracted with waies, L. Damasippus the Pretour, having according to the will and pleasure of C. Marius the Consull, gathered the Senate together, massacred all the nobilitie of the citie. Out of which number Q. Mutius Scaevola the Arch-Pontiffe, as hee fled, was in the very porch and entrie of Vestaes temple murdered. Besides, this booke concerneth the war renewed by L. Murena against Mithridates in Asia.

Of the LXXXVII. booke.

Sylla after he had discomfited and overthrowne the armie of C. Marius, neere a place called Sacripontius, besieged him within the towne Praeneste. The citie of Rome hee recovered out of the hands of his enemies: and when Marius made an offer to sallie forth, hee repelled him. Moreover this booke containeth the exploits atchieved by his lieutenants, with the like fortune of that side in all places.

Of the LXXXVIII. booke.

Sylla after that he had defeated and put to the sword the armie of Carbo at Clusium, Faventia and Eidentia, chased him forth of Italie. With the Samnites who alone of all the Italian nations had not yet laid down armes, he fought one small battaile, & vanquished them neere the citie of Rome, even before the gate Collina: & thus having recovered & gotten into his hand the absolute manning of the state, he polluted and stained this most goodly and beautifull victorie, with the foulest crueltie that ever man committed. He cut the throats of 8000 in this great hostilitie, called Villa Pubbia; even those that had yeelded themselves. He set up the table of proscription & outlawrie. The citie of Rome & all Italy throughout filled with massacres. Among the rest he caused at the Praenestines disarmed as they were, to be slaine.

Marius

Marius a Senatour by calling, he killed in this manner, by breaking his armes and legs, by cropping his eares, & digging out his eyes. C. Marius besieged within Preneſte, by Lucretius Afella and thus ſide with Sylla; when hee ſought meanes of euaſion by a mine under the ground, ſeeing how hee was environned by the armie, ſlew himſelfe within the ſaid mine: for perceiving that he could not eſcape, hee and Pontius Teſtinius that accompanied him in this flight, ran one at the other with their drawn naked ſwords: and when he had killed him, and was himſelfe hurt, he found ſo much kindnes at his ſlaves hand, as to make an end of him quiſe.

Of the L XXXIX. booke.

Pompeius Brutus ſent from Cn. Papyrius Carbo, who was arrived at Coreyra, in a fiſhers boate to Lilybaum, in eſſiall to ſee whether Pompeie were there: being compaſſed and hemmed in round about by thoſe veſſels which Pompeie had ſent out, turned his ſwords point to his boate, & ſet the pummell againſt a ſeat within the boat, & ſo bending forward with the poſſe of his bodie, was pierced through and died. Cn. Pompeius ſent by the Senate with full commiſſion of rule and command, took e Cn. Carbo priſoner, who was arrived in the Ilands Coſſura, and ſlew him, who kept a pining & weeping like a woman when he ſhould die. Sylla became Dictator, & that which never any man had done beſides him, kept his port abroad with foure and twentie Huſhers or liſtors going before him with their rods and axes. Hee altered the ſtate, & in that innovation eſtabliſhed it. The Tribunes of the commons hee abridged of their authoritie, and wholly deprived them of their power to preferre and publiſh lawes. The Colledge of the Pontifics and Augurs he amplified and augmented, to the number of 15. The bodie of the Senate he ſupplied out of the order of gentlemen. The children of thoſe whom hee had proſcribed and outlawed, hee diſabled for being eligible to any honourable office, and of their goods made port-sale, whereof at firſt hee ſeized much by violence and had it way. A mightie maſſe of money hee raiſed thereof, amounting to a hundred and fiſtie millions of Seſterces. He commanded Q. Lucretius Ofella to be killed in the very Forum of Rome, for that hee preſumed without his leave and licence to ſue for a Conſulſhip: and when the people of Rome were highly offended at this indignitie, he aſſembled them to a publicke audience, and before them avowed the fact and took it upon him. Cn. Pompeius in Affricke vanquiſhed and ſlew in baſtaile Cn. Domitius, one of the proſcript out-laves: and Hiarbas king of the Numidians, who prepared to levie warre, He being but foure & twenty yeeres of age, and no better as yet, than a gentleman of Rome (a thing that never any man attained unto) triumphed over Affricke. C. Norbanus, a man who had been Conſull, and now proſcript and outlawed, was apprehended in the citie of Rhodes, and thereupon ſlew himſelfe. Mutulus likewiſe one of them that were outlawed and out of protection, being come privily diſguiſed with his head covered to the backe doore of Baſtia his wives houſe, was not let in, for that ſhe ſaid he was an outlaw: whereupon he tooke the ſlab at his owne hands, and with his heart bloud beſpreint the doore of his wives houſe. Sylla recovered and woon againe Nola in Samnium. He brought ſeven and ſortie legions into the lands conquered from the enemies, planted them therein, and divided the grounds amongſt them. Hee beſieged the towne Velaterra, which yet ſtood out and bare armes, and at length upon ſurrender, got it. Mytilene alſo, the onely cittie in Aſia (which after that Mitbridates was ſubdued maintained war) was fired and raiſed downe to the ground.

Of the XC. booke.

Sylla departed this life, and this honour was done unto him by the Senate, that he was enterred in Mars field. M. Lepidus going about to cencile and abolſh the acts of Sylla, raiſed new warre: and by Q. Catulus (his companion in government) was driven out of Italie: and when he prepared to wage warre (but to no effect) in Sardinia, there he perished and came to his death. M. Brutus who held *Lumbardie, was by Cn. Pompeius ſlaine. Q. Sertorius another proſcript outlaw, levied a great war in the netherlands of Spaine. Lucius Manlius the Pro-conſul, and M. Domitius a lieutenant, were in fight overcome by Hercules the treaſurer. Moreover this booke containeth the acts performed by P. Servilius the Pro-conſull againſt the Cilicians.

Of the XCI. booke.

Cneus Pompeius being as yet but a gentleman of Rome, was ſent with full commiſſion of Conſular command againſt Sertorius. Certain cities had Sertorius woon by aſſault, & brought under many States to be at his devotion. Ap. Claudius the Proconſull overcame the Thracians in divers and ſundry battels. Q. Metellus the Proconſull, defeated and ſlew L. Hirculeius the treaſurer of Sertorius, with all his armie.

Of the XCII. booke.

Cneus Pompeius hitherto fought with Sertorius in doubtfull event, ſo as of both parts, one of the wings and points of the battell had the better hand. Q. Sertorius overthrew in fight Metellus & Perpenna with their two armies. Pompeius deſirous to carie away his part in that victory, entred into the field, but made no ſaving game of it. Afterwards Sertorius was beſieged within Calagurium, but by daily and continuall ſallies forth, gave the enemies that lay in ſiege within as good as they brought. Over and beſides, herein are contained the deeds achieved by Curio the Pro-conſull in Thrace againſt thoſe Dardaniens, together with ſundry cruel and bloudie parts played by Q. Sertorius, even with thoſe of his owne ſide. For many of his owne friends, and ſuch as were with him outlawed, upon imputations of treaſon pretended againſt them, he put to death.

Of the XCIII. booke.

Publius Servilius the Proconſull in Cilicia, ſubdued the Iſaurians, and wan certaine townes of the pirates. Nicomedes king of Bithynia at his death made the people of Rome his full heire. & his kingdom was reduced into the forme of a province. Mitbridates contracted a league with Sertorius, and waged warre againſt the people of Rome. Herein is ſhewed the great preparation of warre that the king made as well by land as ſea, and how he ſeized upon Bithynia. M. Aurelius Cotta the Conſul was in battell vanquiſhed by the king at Chalcedon. Moreover, this booke containeth the exploits of Pompeius and Metellus againſt Sertorius, who in all warlike feats and martiall proweſſe was equall unto them, whom alſo he raiſed from the ſiege before the towne Calagurium, and compelled to goe into divers countries, Pompeius into the farther province of Spaine, and Pompeius into Gallia.

Of the XCIII. booke.

Lucius Lucullus the Conſull fought againſt Mitbridates, and in horſe ſervice had the better hand of him. Certaine rodes he made with good ſucceſſe, and when his ſouldiers called hard upon him for battell, he ſlaid them from mutinie. Deiotarus a tetrarch of Gallogrecia, defeated the capitaines of king Mitbridates who levied warre in Phrygia. Moreover this booke containeth the fortunate achievements of Pompeius againſt Sertorius in Spaine.

Of the XCV. booke.

Caius Curio the Pro-conſull vanquiſhed and ſubdued the Dardaniens in Thrace. Threeſcore and ſeventeen ſword-plaiers of Capua fled out of the ſenſeſchoole of Lentulus at Capua: who having gathered together a number of ſlaves, and hired hines, raiſed warre under the leading of Chryſus & Spartacus, and vanquiſhed in plaine field, Cl. Pulcher a lieutenant, and P. Varinius the Pretour. L. Lucullus the Proconſull with the ſame and the ſword together tamed and ſubdued the hoſt of Mitbridates at the citie Cixicus: and when they had chaſed him out of Bithynia after many overthrowes in warre and miſfortunes of ſhipwracke at ſea, wherewith his heart was quailed, he compelled him to ſue into Pontus.

Of the XCVI. booke.

Vintus Arrius the Pretour defeated and ſlew Chryſus the captaine of the fugitives, and with him twenty thouſand men. Caius Lentulus the Conſull received a foile and overthrow at the hands of Spartacus. Hee alſo overcame in fight Lu. Gellius the Conſull and Quintus Arrius. Sertorius was at a banquet ſlaine by Manius Antonius and M. Perpenna with other conſpirators in the night.

eight year of his dukedome. A captain and brave warrior he was. He fought with Pompeius and Metellus, two famous Generals and commanders. Many a time he saved his owne, but more oftener he went away winner, howbeit, in the end he was abandoned and betrayed. The soveraigne command of that side was made over to Marcus Perperna, whom Cn. Pompeius vanquished take prisoner and slew: so about the tenth yeere after the warre began, he recovered Spaine. C. Cassius the Proconsull, and Cneus Manlius the Pretor, were foiled by Spartacus in the field, and that war was committed over to the managing and conduct of M. Crassus the Pretour.

Of the XC VII. booke.

Marcus Crassus the Pretour first fought with a power of the fugitives aforesaid, consisting of Frenchmen and Germanes, and won the better for he slew 350000 enemies and their chiefeain Granicus. After that, he warred against Spartacus, killed him also and 40000 with him. Manius Antonius the Pretour maintained war unfortunately against the Cretensians, and by his death tooke an end. M. Lucullus the Proconsull brought the Thracians under subjection. E. Lucullus had the upper hand in a battell of Mithridates in Pontus, and slew above sixtie thousand enemies. M. Crassus and Cn. Pompeius were created Cos. and as Crassus immediately out of his Pretorship stepped to that dignitie, so Pompey was of a gentleman of Rome and no better advanced thereunto, even before he had borne the office of Treasurer. They restored againe the Tribunes power and authoritie. By the meanes of Aurelius Cotta, the prebeminence of iudges also was translated unto the gentlemen of Rome. Mithridates, seeing his owne estate lying in despair, fled unto Tigranes king of Armenia for succour.

Of the XC VIII. booke.

Machares the son of Mithridates, king of Bosphorus, was by L. Lucullus received into amitie. Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius the Censors administered their office with great severitie and rigor, and deposed threecore from Senators dignitie: they also held a review and purged the citie. Enrolled there were 450000 citizens of Rome. L. Metellus lord Pretor in Sicilie fought fortunatly against the pyrates and rovers. The temple of Iupiter in the Capitoll, which by fire had ben consumed, was redified by Qu. Catulus, and dedicated anew. L. Lucullus in Armenia discomfited in many battels Mithridates & Tigranes, with a mightie power of both kings. Qu. Metellus the Proconsull having the charge of the warre against the Candiotes, besieged the citie *Cydonia. C. Triarius a lieutenant under Lucullus received a foile of Mithridates in fight. Lucullus was impeached and staid for pursuing Mithridates & Tigranes that he could not accomplish his victorie, by occasion of a mutinie among his owne souldiers, who would not follow, because the Valerian legions forsooke Lucullus, alledging that they had served their time fully out.

Of the XC IX. booke.

Vintus Metellus the Proconsull forced by assault Gnos, Lyellus, Cydonia, and many other cities [in Crete] L. Roscius a Tribune of the Commons published a law, that the gentlemen of Rome should be allowed the fouretee next seats in the scaffold of the Theatre, to behold the games and plaies. Cn. Pompeius being commanded by a law promulged unto the people for to pursue the rovers aforesaid, who had debarred and cut off all commerce for corne and victuals, within 74 daies, rid the sea of them quite. & after the war with them finished in Cilicia, he received them upon submission, and gave them cities and lands to possesse. Moreover this booke containeth the worstie exploits of Qu. Metellus against the Cretensians. The letters also of Metellus and Cneus Pompeius, sent from the one to the other: in which Metellus complaineth that Pompeius by sending his own lieutenant into Crete, to receive the surrender and homage of the cities there, annulled and passed by the glorie of those acts which he had achieved. Pompeius againe rendereth a reason thereof, and alledgeth that so he ought to doe.

Of the C. booke.

Aius Manlius a Trib. of the Com. preferred a bill, to the exceeding displeasure & indignation of the nobles. That the war against Mithridates, should be assigned to Pompeie. His speech to the people imported and was effectfull. Qu. Metellus having subdued the Cretensians, gave laws lawes unto that Island, which until that time enioied freedome of State. Cn. Pompeius went his journey for to levee war against Mithridates, and with Phraates king of the Parthians he renewed the league. In a battell performed by horse-service he overcame Mithridates. Also herein is contained the warre, first betwene Phraates king of the Parthians, and Tigranes king of the Armenians: afterwards between Tigranes the son and his father.

Of the CI. booke.

Cneus Pompeius vanquished Mithridates in a battell fought by night, and compelled him to fle ¹⁰ *Bosphorus. He received Tigranes upon his submission: & when he had taken from him Syria, Ph¹⁰ or Bosphoria, and Cilicia, he gave him againe the kingdome of Armenia. Their conspiracie, who having been condemned for the inordinate and ambitious suite of the Consulship, were confedered to kil the Consuls, was surprised and dashed. Cn. Pompeius following the chase after Mithridates, entred into farre remote countries and unknown nations. The *Berians and Albanes who would not grant him passage, he overcame in battell. Over and besides, this booke sheweth how Mithridates fled by Colchij and Heniochi, and what his acts were in Bosphorus. ¹⁰ Georgians at this day.

Of the CII. booke.

Cn. Pompeius reduced the realme of Pontus into the forme of a province. Pharnaces the son of Mithridates made war upon his own father, by whom Mithridates was besieged within his own royal court and palace. Whereupon he dranke poison, and seeing it was not effectuall and strong ynough to dispatch him, he was killed by a French soldiour, named Bitatus, whose helping hand he requested for to rid him out of the world. Cn. Pompeius subdued the Jews: their famous temple of Ierusalem, which until that day never had suffered abuse and violence, bee forced and woun. Catiline, by occasion that hee had twice suffered a repulse in suing to be Consul, conspired together with Lentulus the Pretor, Cethegus & many others, to massacre the Consuls & the Senat, to set the citie on fire, and to subvert and overthrow the State of the commonweale, and to this purpose had levied an armie in Tuscanie. This treason & conspiracie was by the industrie of M. Tullius Cicero, detected and found out. Catiline was banished the citie. The rest of his complices and adherents every one suffered death accordingly.

Of the CIII. booke.

Catiline together with his armie, was by C. Antonius the Proconsull deposed and slaine. P. Clodius was accused, for entring (in the habit and apparel of a woman) that *chappell which it was not lawfull for a man to go into, and notwithstanding he had committed adulterie with the archpontifes wife, yet he was acquit and went cleer away. Cn. Pompeius the Pretor vanquished at Salone the Allobroges, who had rebelled. P. Clodius left the nobilitie, and raunged himselfe with the Com. C. Caesar subdued the Portugals. At what time as he was in election to be Cos. and went about to invade and make havocke of the C. W. there arose a conspiracie among three of the most principal personages of the citie. Cn. Pompeius, M. Crassus and C. Caesar. The Agrarian lawes were by Caesar the Cos. published with great strife & contention: the Senat was unwilling therunto; but by the other Consull M. Bibulus they passed. C. Antonius Proconsull in Thracia sped but badly in his war affairs. M. Cicero was banished the citie by vertue of an act promulged by P. Clodius Trib. of the Com. for that he had put to death certain Romane citizens: uncondemned, Caesar made a voiage into the province of Gaule, where hee subdued the Helvetians, a vagrant and wandering nation in those daies, who seeking a place to inhabit, intended through the province of Caesar, to travell into *Narbo. Moreover it containeth the situation of France. Pompeius triumphed over the children of Mithridates, also over Tigranes and his sonne, and by one voice and general consent of the whole assembly, was saluted by the name of *Magnus. ¹⁰ Not bene. ¹⁰ Great.

Of the CIV. booke.

The forepart of this book compriseth the site & description, together with the maners of Germany, C. Caesar at what time as he led his armie against the Germans, at the request of the Hedunians and Sequanians, whose territorie by them was possessed, and who under the conduct of Ariovistus were come downe into France, by an Oracion to his armie staied the timorous disposition of the souldiours, which arose upon the feare they had of new and straunge enemies, vanquished the Germanes in plaine fight, and drave them cleane out of Fraunce. M. Cicero, by meanes of Pompeius (who among others made an Oracion in his behalf) and of T. Annius Milo, a Tribune of the Commons, who likewise pleaded his cause, with the exceeding ioy of the Senate and ail Italie, called home from exile. Cn. Pompeius had commission for five yeere space, to looke unto the provision of corne and victuals. Caesar overcame in fight the Ambians, Sucfiones, Viromandians, Atrebat (nations all of the Belga) of whom there was an exceeding multitude, and received them upon yeelding to his protection. Afterwards hee fought with pissing great hazard and icopardie against the Nervii, one of the foresaid States, and in fine utterly destroyed and extinguished their whole generation: for they had waged war so long, untill of sixtie thousand armed men, there remained but three hundred, and of ninetie five of their noblemen, three onely escaped and no more. There passed a law for to reduce Cyprus into the forme of a province, and to confiscate the kings treasure by vertue whereof, the managing of that affair was committed to C. Cato. Ptolomeus king of Egypt suffered many wrongs and iniuries at his owne subiects hands, and being by them expelled out of his kingdome came to Rome. C. Caesar in a battell at sea vanquished the Ptenetians, a State and citie seated in the very Ocean. Last of all, it reporteth the exploits by his lieutenants performed with like good fortune.

Of the CV. booke.

At what time as the assembly for election of magistrates might not bee holden, by reason of the negatives and inhibitions of C. Cato a Trib. of the Com. the Senate generally in token of sorrow put on mourning weed, M. Cato in his sute for a Pretorship, suffered a repulse, & Vatinius was preferred before him. The same Vatinius when he would have impeached the law, whereby were graunted to the Coss. the provinces for five yeers, unto Pompey the government of both Spaine, unto Crassus Syria & the Parthian war, & unto Caesar France and Germanie, was by C. Trebonius a Trib. of the Commons, & the first maker of the said law, committed to prison. A Gabinius the Proconsull established Ptolomeus againe in the kingdome of Egypt, and disseized Archelaus whom they had set up for their king. Caesar after he had vanquished and put to sword the Germanes in France, crossed over the Rhene, and subdued that part of Germanie which is next thereto: which done, hee sailed over into Brittain with much trouble and dammage, by reason of the crosse and contrary winds whiles he was at sea; and hee sped little better when he was there: but after he had slain a mightie great number of men, he brought into subiecti on the rest of the Island.

Of the CVI. booke.

Julia daughter to Caesar and wife to Pompeius departed this life, and had this surpassing honour done unto her by the people, as to be enterred in Mars field. Many of the States of France revolted by the leading of Ambiorix a duke of the Eburones, by whom Cotta & T. Aurunculeius the lieutenants of Caesar, were by an ambuscado surprised and environed, and by meanes thereof they and the armies whereof they had the conduct, were put to the sword. And at what time as the campe of the other legions also were besieged, assailed, and with difficultie defended, & among them Q. Cicero, who was lord president of the Trevires, the enemies were by Caesar himselfe in person overthrowne in fight. M. Crassus intending to warre upon the Parthians, passed over the river Euphrates, and being vanquished in battell, wherein his owne sonne was slaine, after hee had rallied the broken ends of his armie, and retired them to a little hill, he was trined forth by the enemies (whose capitaine was Suras) to a parley and treatie of peace, and then upon attached: but because he would not suffer any indignitie and villanie alive, he made resistance, and in that struggling of his was slaine, and there an end of him.

Of the CVII. booke.

Caesar having vanquished the Trevirs in Gaul, passed over the second time into Germany, but finding no enemy there to make head, returned into France, where the Eburones & other cities which had conspired, he overcame, put their King Ambiorix to flight, & followed him in chase. The bodie of P. Clodius slain in the high way Appia near Bovilla by T. Annius Milo a competitor of the Consulship, Consulship, the Commons of Rome burnt in a funeral fire within the Curia [Hofilia]. By occasion of a sedition variance between two Candidates for a Consulship, namely Hypseus Scipio, and Mito, who with force and armes tried the issue by the ears; Cn. Pompeius was sent out of the Senate to suppress such enormous debates. Created Consul hee was the third time in his absence, and (which preiudiciall no man ever had) alone without Colleague. A commission was granted forth to sit upon the death of Pub. Clodius by vertue whereof Milo was iudicially condemned, and had his iudgement to bee banished. A bill was proposed, that C. Caesar notwithstanding he was absent, should bee accepted of in the election of Consuls, albeit M. Cato was unwilling thereto, and gaine said it. Moreover, this booke containeth the warlike acts atchieved by C. Caesar against the Gauls (who generally in manner revolted under the leading of Vercingetorix the Arvernian: also the painefull sieges of certaine cities, and namely of *Avaricum *Bitorige, and *Gergovia in Auvergne.

Caesar vanquished the Gauls at *Alexia, and received all the cities in France which had been in armes, into his protection upon their submission. C. Cassius the treasurer of M. Crassus, put the Parthians to the sword, who had passed over into Syria. M. Cato sued to be Consul, and had the repulse, and Ser. Sulpitius with M. Marcellus were created Consuls. C. Caesar subdued the Beltruci, with other States and cities in Fraunce. Also it containeth the strife and debate betweene the Consuls about sending of a successor to C. Caesar. For M. Marcellus the Consul was earnest in the Senate, that Caesar should come to stand for a Consulship, considering that hee by a law made in that behalfe was to govern his provinces unto that time of his Consulship. Last of all the martiall deeds of Mar. Bibulus in Syria are here reported.

Moreover, this booke treateth of the actions preferred by C. Curio, a Tribune of the Commons, first against Caesar, and afterwards for him. When there passed an act of the Senate, that one or other without faile should bee employed to succeed Caesar, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, two other Tribunes (for that by their negatives and inhibitions they seemed to crosse and stay that act) were expelled the citie and a commission was directed by the Senat to the Consuls, and to Cn. Pompeius, in this forme, To see that the Commonweale sustained no dammage. C. Caesar intending to persecute his adversarie, came with his armie into Italie. Corfinius together with L. Domitius and L. Lentulus he tooke prisoners, and let them goe again: but Cn. Pompeius and the rest of that side he utterly chased forth of Italie.

Of the CX. booke.

Caesar besieged Massiles, which had shut the gates against him: who leaving C. Trebonius and D. Brutus at the siege, tooke a iourney into Spaine, where hee received upon submission Luc. Afranius and C. Petreius, two lieutenants of Pompeius, together with seven legions at *Ilerda, & dismissed them all with no harme done unto them. Varro also a lieutenant of Pompeius, together with his armie came under his obedience. The Gaditanes he enfranchised & gave the citie unto. The Massilians after two overthrowes in sea fight, and a long siege which they had endured, submitted at last and were at the devotion of Caesar. C. Antonius a lieutenant of Caesar, fought an unfortunate battell against the Pompeians, and in Illyricum was taken prisoner: during which war, the inhabitants of *Opeturgum, beyond the river of Padus (who were the auxiliaries of Caesar) seeing their chained bridge of boats and lighters locked up and fast shut within the enemies ships, rather than they would fall into the hands of their enemies, ran one upon another, and died every one. C. Curio, a lieutenant of Caesar in Africk, after hee had fought against Varus a capitaine of the Pompeians, was together with his armie defeated and cut in peeces by Iuba king of *Mauritania. C. Caesar passed the seas over into Greece.

Of the CXI. booke.

Caius Cæcilius Rufus the Pretour going about to raise commotions and seditions all that ever he could within the citie, and having solicited the commons upon the hope of cancelling all debtes, was first deposed from his magistracie, and after driven out of the citie. Then hee banded with Milo a banished person, who had levied a power of fugitive outlaws: but both of them in this preparation of warre came short of their purpose and were slaine. Cleopatra queen of Egypt was by her brother Ptolomeus expelled out of her kingdome. By reason of the avarice and crueltie of Q. Catulus the Pretour, the *Cordubians in Spaine together with two Varian legions, revolted from Cesar & his side. Cn. Pompeius was besieged by Cesar at Brundisium: but having won his sconces with the guards thereto belonging, and that with great losse of the adverse part, he was delivered from the siege. But after the warre was translated into Thessalie, he was at Pharsalia in a battaile overthrowne. There remained still within the campe, Cicero, a man by nature framed for nothing more unfit than war, Cesar pardoned all those of the adverse part, who after his victorie submitted themselves to his mercie.

Of the CXII. booke.

Herein is related the fearfull condition of that side which was vanquished, and how they fled in sundrie parts of the world. Cn. Pompeius being arrived in Egypt, by the commandement of Ptolomeus the king, as yet an infant under age; and perswasion of Theodorus his teacher and schoolmaster, who might of all other over-rule the King, also of one Photinus, was killed by the hands of Achilla, one who had a warrant to execute that feat, even in his very barge before hee was landed. But Cornelia his wife, and Sextus Pompeius his sonne, fled backe into Cyprus. Cesar three daies after the foresaid victorie, pursued Pompeius: and when Theodorus presented unto him his head and signet of his finger, he was displeased in his heart and wept withall. He entred Alexandria without any danger, notwithstanding the troubles and hurlyburly therein. Cesar was created Dictatour. Hee restored Cleopatra unto the kingdome of Egypt: and when Ptolomeus made warre by their advice and counsell who moved him to murder Pompeius, Cesar vanquished him, with great perill and hazard of himselfe. As Ptolomeus fled, his vessel wherein he was embarked ran a ground in Nilus, and there stucke fast. Besides, this booke sheweth the painfull and toilsome journey of Marcus Cato with his legions, in Affricke through the desert wilderness: and the war which Cn. Domitius fortunately managed against Phraates the Parthian king.

Of the CXIII. booke.

When the side of Pompeius had gathered heart and strength in Affricke, the soveraigne command thereof was committed to P. Scipio: for Milo who before had equal power & commission with him, gave place & yielded his right. Now when it was debated in counsell as touching the subversion and utter ruine of Vtica, for that the citie was so inclined and favourable to Cesar: whiles Marcus Cato stood stiff in this point, that it should not be destroyed; and Iuba the king was earnest to have it raised: the guard and keeping thereof was committed unto Cato. The sonne of Pompeius the great, having levied forces in Spaine (the conduct and leading whereof, neither Afranius nor Petreius were willing to undertake) made fresh warre upon Cesar. Pharnaces king of Pontus and sonne of Mithridates, endured no time of warre, but was soone overcome. At what time as P. Dolabella a Tribune of the commons, raised seditions in Rome, by meanes of a law by him published in the behalfe of bankrupts, that the old debts should be stricken off, and new order taken with the creditors: upon which occasion there ensued a commotion of the commons; M. Antonius, General of the Cavallerie, entred the citie with a strength of souldiours; and eight hundred of the commons lost their lives. Cesar discharged all his old souldiours, who in a mutinie demanded the same: and having sailed into Affricke, befought against the power of king Iuba with exceeding great iopardie.

Of the CX XIII. booke.

Cæcilius Bassus a gentleman of Rome and one of Pompeies side, levied warre in Syria. Sextus Cesar was both forsaken by the legion which revolted and went to Bassus, and also slaine.

Cesar

Cesar vanquished Scipio the Pretor, Afranius, and Iuba, near Tapos, and forced their campe. Cato bearing thereof, wound'd himselfe at Vtica: and when his sonne came betwene and staied his hand, his hurt was dressed, but in the very cure, as the wound was newly launced againe, hee yielded up his vital breath and died, in the nine and fortieth yeere of his age. Petreius killed Iuba and himselfe. P. Scipio in his ship was beset round, and at his death, which he tooke manfully, he uttered a brave speech: for when the enemies made furch and enquire what was become of the General, The Generall (quoth he) is well. Faustus and Afranius were slaine. Catos sonne had his pardon. Brutus, a lieutenant of Cesar vanquished the Bellovacii in France that rebelled.

Of the CXV. booke.

Cesar rode in foure triumphs over France, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa. A solemne feast he made, and exhibited unto the people shewes of all sorts. Vnto M. Marcellus a man of Consular dignitie, at the request of the Senate he graunted leave to returne: which Marcellus, could not enjoy the benefit of this grace and favour, by reason that hee was murdered at Athens by Cn. Magius Chilo, his owne client and vassale. Cesar also held a review of the citie, wherein were enrolled a hundred and fiftie thousand citizens: whereas before there had been numbred foure hundred thousand. See the calamitie of civill warre. He tooke a voyage into Spaine against Sex. Pompeius: and after many roades and expeditions on both sides made, and some cities forced, in the end he attained one finall victorie for all before the citie Munda, but with exceeding perill and danger. Sex. Pompeius escaped and fled.

Of the CXVI. booke.

Caius Cesar triumphed a fift time over Spaine. When many honors and those right excellent, were by the Senate ordained for him, and namely among the rest, to be called Pater Patrie; to bee sacrosanct and inviolable; and withall to bee Dictator for ever; he gave occasion to bee envied and maliced: first in that, when the Senate bestowed upon him these honourable titles, at what time as hee sat before the temple of Venus Genetrix, he rose not up nor did reverence unto them; secondly, for that when Mar. Antonius the Consul and his colleague ran among the Luperci, he laid upon his yvorie chair of estate the wreath or diademe which was by him set upon his head; thirdly, because hee deprived from their authoritie Epidius Marullus and Cæcilius Flavius, two Tribunes of the Commons, who went about to bring him into hatred, as if hee affected and sought to bee king. Upon these causes, a conspiracie was contrived against him, whereof the principall heads, were M. Brutus, C. Trebonius, & C. Cassius, also one of his owne side D. Brutus, by whom he was massacred in the court of Pompeius, and received thre and twentie wounds: and by these murderers was the Capitoll seized and held. But after that the Senat had passed a decree to forget this murder, the conspirators asor-said, having received for their securitie the children of Antonius and Lepidus, as hostages, came downe from the Capitoll. By the last will and testament of Cesar, C. Octavius (his sisters sonne) was made his halfe heire, and adopted into his owne name. The bodie of Cesar being brought into Mars field, was by the Commons burnt in a funerall fire before the Rostra. The honor and dignitie of Dictatorship was for ever abolished. Chamaces a person of most vile and base condition, avowed himselfe to bee the sonne of C. Marius: and whiles hee raised a sedition among the credulous common people, was cut off and killed.

Of the CXVII.

Caius Octavius from out of Epirus repaired to Rome: for Cesar had sent him thither before, when he minded to make war in Macedonie, where hee was received with good tokens and fortunate preages, and withall took upon him the name of Cesar. In this confusion of state and tumultuous trouble of all things, Lepidus attained by stealth to the highest pontificall dignitie. But when M. Antonius the Consul demeaned himselfe most lordly and proudly in his place, and by force published a law as touching the exchange of the provinces, and withall offered much wrong and abuse to Cesar, when he made request that he would assist and stand with him in revenge of those that murdered his unckle: Cesar, to the end that he might make both himselfe and the Commonweale strong against him, raised & excited those old souldiours whom he had before placed in Colonies. The fourth legion also, & that called Martia, sel from Antonius and turned their ensignes to Cesar. After this, more besides (by occasion that that many through the crueltie of M. Antonius were murdered every where in their tents) because they were once suspected, revolted from him and raunged to Caesar. D. Brutus purposing to slep Antonius, as he should passe into Lumbardie, seized upon Mutina with an armie. Finally this booke declares the running too and fro of those on both parts, to be possessed first of the provinces, and the preparation for warre.

* For as he envied the citie, the circle of the sunne gathered about it an Halo round like a rainbow or quinqueland, even over his head.

Of the CXVIII. booke.

Marcus Brutus in Greece (under a pretence of maintaining the state, and enterprising warre against Antonius) possessed himselfe of the armie whereof Vetus had the conduct, together with the province. Vnto Caesar who first tooke arms in defence of the C.W. the government and command of a Pro-pretour was graunted, with the Pretorian ornaments and ensignes thereto belonging, and withall, he had this addition to bee reputed Pro-prator. M. Antonius besieged D. Brutus in Mutina. Certaine embassadours were sent unto him from the Senat as concerning peace, but little availed they in the treatie and conclusion thereof. The people of Rome generally betooke them to arms and souldiours habite, Brutus in Epirus subdued C. Antonius the Pretour together with his armie.

Of the CXIX. booke.

Cneus Trebonius was by the guilefull practise of P. Dolabella, slaine in Asia: for which scil Dolabella was by the Senat iudged an enemy to the state. When Pansa the Cos. was at the point to loose the field against Antonius, A. Hirtius the other Cos. came with his armie to the rescue, discomfited the forces of M. Antonius, and so made the fortune of both parts alike and equall. Afterwards, Antonius being vanquished by Hirtius and Caesar, fled into France, and ioined unto him M. Lepidus with the legions which were under him. Both he and all they who were within his holds in garrison, were by the Senat attainted. Aulus Hirtius, who after his victorie was slaine within the campe of the enemies, and L. Pansa, who died of a wound received in an unfortunate fight, were both buried in Mars field. To C. Caesar the onely captaine of the three now remaining alive, the Senat was not so kind as they ought to have bene: for having ordained that D. Brutus (who by Caesar had bene delivered from the siege at Mutina) should triumph, they made no thankful remembrance of Caesar & his souldiours, as was meet and requisite. For which discourtesies, C. Caesar (being reconciled to M. Antonius by the means and meditation of M. Lepidus) came to Rome with an armie: and when they were sore dismaied at his coming, who had before intreated him so unkindly, created Consul he was [with Q. Pædus] being but nineteen yeeres of age, or not full twentie, for he wanted one day, as Velleius Paterculus saith.

Of the CXX. booke.

Cæsar now Consul, proposed a law for an inquisition to be made of them by whose means his father Caesar was killed: and by vertue of that law, M. Brutus, C. Cassius, and D. Brutus were endited, attainted and condemned in their absence. When together with M. Antonius, Asinius Pollio also and Munatius Plancus had ioined their armes, and therby much strengthened and augmented their forces, D. Brutus whom the Senat had sent with commission to pursue Antonius, being now forlorne of his owne legions and fled, was at the commandement of Antonius (into whose hands hee fell) killed by one Capenus a Burgonian. Caius Caesar contracted a peace with Antonius and Lepidus, wherein it was capitulated betwene them, that those three should for five yeeres have the soveraigntie over all, onely to set in order and establish the state of the commonweale: to wit himselfe, Lepidus, and Antonius, and ech of them proscrib and outlaw their own adversaries and enemies. In which proscription were contained the names of very many gentlemen of Rome, and one hundred and thirtie Senatours, and among the rest, were L. Paulus the brother of M. Lepidus, L. Caesar the uncle of Antonius by the mother, and M. Cicero, slaine by Popilius a legionario souldiour, in the 63 yeere of his age: whose head and hands was set up on the Rostra. Moreover this booke sheweth the deeds by M. Brutus atchieved in Greece.

Of

Of the CX XI. booke.

Cassius, who had in commission from the Senate, to pursue by force of armes Dolabella iudged an enemy to the commonweale, being borne out by the authoritie and warrant of the State, possessed himselfe of Syria, and became maister of three armies which were in that province. He besieged Dolabella within the citie of Laodicea, and did him to death. C. Antonius was likewise taken prisoner, and by commandement from M. Brutus, slaine.

Of the CXXII. booke.

Marcus Brutus had but bad successe in fight against the Thracians. After that all the provinces beyond-sea, and the armies, were under his hands and Caius Cassius, they complotted both together at Smyrna, what course to take for the future warre. Publicola the brother of M. Messala they vanquished, and yet by common consent they pardoned him.

Of the CXXIII. booke.

Sextus Pompeius the sonne of Magnus, assembled together out of Epirus a number of outlawes and banished persons, and having a long time with this armie robbed only by way of piracie, and settled as yet upon the possission of no peece upon the land, first seized Messana a towne in Sicilie, and afterwards the whole province. And after that A. Pompeius Bithynicus the Pretour there, was by Pompeie slaine; he the said Pompeie in a battaile at sea vanquished Q. Salvidienus a lieutenant of Caesar. Caesar and Antonie with their armies sailed over into Greece, with intent to wage warre against Brutus and Cassius. Quintus Cornificius in Africke overcame in plaine fight T. Sestius the captain of the Cassian faction.

Of the CXXIII. booke.

Caius Caesar together with Antonie fought at Philippi with variable fortune against Brutus and Cassius, in such sort, as the right points of both battailes had the better, & ech of them woun the others campe. But the death of Cassius was it that turned the ballance & made the difference: who being in that point that reculed and went downe, supposed that the whole armie and maine battaile was discomfited, and so killed himselfe. In another conflict afterwards, M. Brutus also was overcome, and there ended his life: for hee intreated Strato (that accompanied him in his flight) to set his sword's point toward him, and so hee ran upon it. The same did some sortie more of the principall Romanes: among whom was Q. Hortensius likewise slaine.

Of the CXXV. booke.

Caius Caesar left Antonie (for to his share fell the empire of some provinces beyond-sea) & returned into Italie. He divided lands among his old souldiours. The mutinies of his owne armie by occasion that the souldiours were seduced by Fulvia the wife of M. Antonius and rose against their Generall, be repressed with exceeding daunger and jeopardie. L. Antonius the Consul and brother to M. Antonius, by the ungracious counsell and perswasion of the said Fulvia, made warre upon Caesar: and having procured those nations to side and take part with him, whose lands had bene made over and assigned to the old souldiours aforesaid; and withall, discomfited M. Lepidus, who with an armie had the government and guard of the cittie, entred perforce by way of hostilitie into Rome.

Of the CXXVI. booke.

Caius Caesar when hee was but three and twentie yeeres of age, besieged L. Antonius in the towne Perusia: & when he made sundrie offers to sallie out & break forth, he repelled & chased him back, yea and for very hunger forced him to yeld and come under his obaysance. As for Antonie himselfe and all his souldiours, he pardoned, but Perusia he rased and destroyed. Finally after hee had brought all the armie armies of the aduersē side to submit and to stand to his mercie, he finished the warre without effusion of any blood.

Of the CX XVII. booke.

THe Parthians under the conduct of Labienus, who had taken part with Pompeie and that side, invaded Syria; overcame Didius Saxa, the lieutenant of M. Antonius, and held all that province to their owne use. M. Antonius being solicited by the instigation of his wife Fulvia to make war against Caesar, put her away, because she should be no let nor hindrance to the accord and agreement of the three rulers in their Triumvirate. Then made hee a peace with Caesar, and tooke to wife his sister Octavia. Q. Salvidienus who complotted mischief against Caesar, he detected and beheaded: who being thereupon condemned, wrought his owne death. P. Ventidius lieutenant under Antonius overcame the Parthians in battaile, and chased them forth of Syria, having before slaine their leader Labienus. When as Sextus Pompeius held Sicilie, and being a neere enemy and neighbour to Italie, staied the transporting of corne and victuals by sea: upon request Caesar and Antonie made peace with him for this consideration, that he should governe Sicilie as his province. Also herein are set forth the troubles and warres of Africke.

Of the CXXVIII. booke.

WHen Sext. Pompeius infested the sea againe with roverie and piracie, and would not make good & mainteine that peace, which he had accepted of Caesar, he was forced upon necessity to undertake war against him, and in two navall battailes fought his doubtfull event. L. Ventidius a lieutenant of M. Antonius, vanquished the Parthians in Syria, and slew their king. The Iewes also were by Antonies lieutenant subdued. Herein besides, is set downe the preparation for the Sicilian warre.

Of the CXXIX. booke.

Sundry battailes were fought at sea against Sex. Pompeius with variable issue: so as, of Caesars two fleets, the one which was conducted by Agrippa, got the better hand: but the other, led by Caesar himselfe, had the overthrow: and the souldiours being set ashore, were in exceeding great danger. But afterwards Pompeius was defeated, and thereupon fled into Sicilie. Marcus Lepidus crossed the seas from out of Africke, pretending to take part with Caesar in his warres to bee made against Sex. Pompeius. But when Caesar warred upon him also, he was abandoned of his armie, and being content to resigne up the honour and dignitie of the Triumvirat, obtained life. M. Agrippa was by Caesar rewarded with a navall crowne, an honour to no man ever graunted before him.

Of the CXXX. booke.

Marcus Antonius, in his rioting time with Cleopatra, entred into the province of Media with eighteen legions, and sixteene thousand horsemen; levied warre upon the Parthians, and after he had lost two of his legions, seeing nothing chieve well on his side, he retired back. But espions the Parthians followed him in chase: whereupon in exceeding fearfull hast and great perill of the whole armie, he returned into Armenia: so as in 27 daies he fled three hundred miles. About 8000 men hee lost by tempestuous weather. But he was himselfe the occasion that he suffered these dangerous tempests, over and besides the Parthian warre which unfortunately he enterprised, because he would not winter in Armenia, for hast he made to his love Cleopatra.

Of the CXXXI. booke.

Sex. Pompeius having once submitted, whiles he was in the protection of M. Antonius, went about to levie warre against him in Asia: but by his lieutenant he was surprised and slain. Caesar staied the murmur of the old souldiours, which with great mischief was begun: he subdued the Iapides, the Dalmatians and Pannonians. Antonius having upon his word and promise of safetie & protection trained trained unto him. Artaxides the king of Armenia, commaunded him to be laid up fast in Irons, and gave the kingdom of Armenia to his owne sonne, which he had by Cleopatra: for now by this time he began to avow her as his wife, upon whom long before he was enamoured and doted in love.

Of the CX XXII. booke.

Marcus Cesar subdued the Dalmatians in Illyricum. When M. Antonius for the love of Cleopatra (who bare him two sonnes, Philadelphus and Alexander) would neither returne to the cittie of Rome, nor after the time of the Triumvirat expired, resigne up that dignitie & government, but prepared for warre, which he went to levie against Rome and Italie: and thereto had raised a mightie power, as well of sea-forces as land; and with wall, had renounced the marriage with Octavia, Caesars sister, and sent her a letter of divorcement and so put her away: Caesar thereupon, with an armie sailed into Epirus. The battailes at sea afterwards, and the horse-fights, wherein Caesar had the upper hand, be here related.

Of the CXXXII. booke.

Marcus Antonius was with his fleet overcome at Actium, and thereupon fled to Alexandria: where being by Caesar besieged, and in utter dispaire of recovering his former state, but moved especially upon a false rumour that was spread, how Cleopatra was killed, hee slew himselfe. When Caesar was now master of Alexandria, Cleopatra likewise because she would not fall into the hands of the conquerour, willingly procured her owne death. Caesar upon his returne to the cittie of Rome, had the honour of three triumphs: the one over Illyricum, another for the victorie at Actium, & the third in regard of Cleopatra. Thus when he had finished all civill warres which had continued one & twentie yeeres, M. Lepidus, the sonne of Lepidus the Triumvir, conspired against Caesar: and whiles hee went about to make warre, was prevented and slaine.

Of the CXXXIII. booke.

Caius Cesar having set the state in good order, and reduced all provinces into one certaine forme, was surnamed also Augustus: and the moneth Sextilis to honour his name was likewise so called. Whiles he sat in vassation at Narbone, he tooke a review of the three provinces of Gaule, which his father (Caesar) had conquered. The war which M. Crassus made against the Bastarnians, Massians and other nations, is here reported.

Of the CXXXV. booke.

His warre which M. Crassus levied against the Thracians, as also which Caesar made upon the Spaniards is here set downe. Likewise how the Salasians, a people inhabiting the Alpes, were utterly subdued.

Of the CXXXVI. booke.

Retia was conquered by Tiberius Nero, and Drusus his wives sonne. Agrippa Caesars sonne in law died: and by Drusus was the generall review and tax taken.

Of the CXXXVII.

The cities of Germanie situate on either side the Rhene, are by Drusus besieged and assailed. The tumult and insurrection which arose in France, by reason of the foresaid review or tax, was appeased. An altar was erected unto Divus Caesar at the confluent of the two rivers, * Arar and * Rhodanus: and a priest was created to offer thereupon, one C. Julius Vercondaridubius an Heduan. * Saône. * Rhodane.

Of the CXXXVIII. booke.

Here is shewed how the Thracians were by L. Piso tamed. Likewise how the Thernsci, Temachateri, the Cauci, and other nations of Germanie beyond the Rhene, were subdued and brought under by the KK. reigned not precisely so many yeeres just, but, for that some (and namely Romulus) went over some months and daies, Dionysius and Livius reckoned them for a full yeere, and laid it to Tarquinius Priscus: but the other abovenamed together with Eusebius, left out those odd months and daies (because they made not up a completer yeere) and assigned but onely seven and thirtie yeeres to the reign of king Priscus. To this may be added another reason of the like nature: namely that, as divers authours have doubtfully reported the yeere, so they are no more certain of the month and day on which the first Consuls began their government. For Plutarch in his problemes writeth, that they entred upon the first day of January: but Macrobius in the first book of his Saturnalia and seventh chapter, seemeth to imply that they tooke their Consuls place the first of June, saying (according to the opinion of others) That June tooke the name of Iunius Brutus: for that in this month, and namely upon the first day thereof (according to a vow where-to he was obliged by the banishment of Tarquine) hee solemnized a sacrifice to the goddesse Carnea upon mount Caelius. Others againe write, how this hapned the foure and twentieth of Februarie: grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of stone, together with the testimony of Ovid, who in the second booke of his Kalender thus writeth:

The soveraigne rule at Rome: since that, no king ever reigned there.*

Some there are besides of opinion, that they entred the first day of Iulie: and of their mind seemeth Iochimus Perionius to be, in his third booke of the Greeke magistrates. In this repugnance therefore of opinions, very doubtfull it is which to follow. As for that of Plutarch, it hath long since bene clearly and learnedly confuted by two great and excellent clerkes, Onuphrius Panvinus, and Sigonius: since it is plaine that it was the sixe hundred yeere from the foundation of the citie, and not before, that the Consuls began their government the first of Januarie. But in setting downe the certaine day, they themselves are not well agreed. For Sigonius after Marlianus inclineth this way and saith, That the first day of the Consuls government was the sixe and twentieth day of May. But Panvinus thinketh that the first Consuls were created the 26 day of Februarie. And this diversitie is found not onely in the day when the first Consuls tooke their government, but also in the time after ensuing. What was the usuall day of any moneth wheron the Consuls were wont to begin their magistracie, a man can hardly find any certaintie before the sixe hundred yeere from the cities foundation. In the foure and fortieth yeere verily after the kings were exiled, the first day of Iuly, as Livie writeth, was the ordinarie day for yeerely magistrates to take their place: but how many yeeres following, that order continued, or at what time it was changed, hee sheweth not before he come to the three hundred and two yeere, and then he saith in his third booke, That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for magistrates to begin their government. Thus much at leastwise we may collect by him (when he saith that this time was solemne) that he meant not two or three yeeres onely, but many. For that is properly called solemne, which is by law usuall observed. Againe, wee read a little after the beginning of the fift booke, that this time also was altered: for whereas the fift day of December was the usuall time that magistrates began to execute their office hee saith, that it was changed, in these words, The principall nobles and lords of the Senat, were it upon the default or the infirmitie of their Generals (that so shamefull an overthrow was received) opined and advised, not to expect and stay for the ordinary time of the election, but presently to creat new militarie Tribunes in Consuls authoritie, who should enter into their government the first day of October, &c. Which opinion of theirs imported, and the whole house accorded to it: wherupon the other Tribunes gainesaid it. But Sergius and Virginius withstood this Act of the Senate, and denied flatly to resigne up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their othe and beginning their magistracie. And a little after, within one page, hee sheweth that the usuall day of entrance into government was altered from the eleventh of December to the first of Sept. saying, When this speech was received with a general applause of all men, and that the nobles and lords of the Senat, &c. But this day was kept but a few yeeres. For about sixe yeeres after, he saith, by occasion that both Consuls lay sicke, it was ordained that the first of Iuly should be the ordinary day. And this also I find was chaunged to another, whatsoever it was, for named it is not: & therefore uncertain. But this hapned in the four hundred & thirteenth yeere after the cities foundation: as Livie about the beginning of the 8 booke sheweth in these words: And when the Consuls were commaunded to resigne up their magistracie before the time, to the

the end that new Consuls might the sooner be created, against so great troubles of war, &c. For in these words The sooner &c. he declareth that the usuall day of entrie into government was then chaunged. But as it is not certainly set downe what day this was; so the other was as well knowne: for soone after, and namely the eight yeere following it was appointed, to wit, the first day of Iuly. Immediately therefore (quoth he) the new Consuls, L. Aemilius Mamercus, and Cn. Plautius were enjoined that day (even the first of Iuly) on which they began their office, to agree and part betweene themselves their provinces. As for the month, wherein for the most part the assembly for election of magistrates was holden, we read it was Februarie; like as the thirteenth of March was ordinarie for them to begin their government. For this day held alwaies, during the second Punicke war and the Macedonian, and longer than so. Thus Livie testifieth in many places (which to quote is needlesse) as in the sixt booke of the second Punicke war, and in the beginning of the first booke as touching the Macedonian. By which, who seeth not that there is great varietie in the moneth and day both, whereupon the magistrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certaintie in computation and account of the time, dependeth upon a precise, exact, firme, and settled reckoning of yeeres, months, and daies; and seeing that in Livies storie it is neither expressly shewed, what yeere, month, or day, the magistrates began their government, nor precisely noted when the reckoning altered; considering also that nothing therein is more wavering and inconstantly delivered, than the very usuall day of entring into magistracie: what marvell is there, if authours dissent so much about the computation of the times? whiles one beginneth at this moneth, another at that: whiles some I say ascribe these magistrates created, to this yeere, others attribute the same to another?

Thirdly, there being great difference betweene Dionysius and Livie, as well about the reckoning of the times and yeeres, as the acts and affaires that therein passed; all seemeth to have risen hereupon, that the purpose of Livie was not to deliver exactly the acts & occurrents of greatest antiquitie which happened in the State of the people of Rome, and which by many writers aforetime had ben most diligently set down & penned to posteritie: but to record & write those things especially, which from the time a little before the second Punick war had been achieved by the people of Rome, unto the age wherein himselfe lived. But because (as Polybius most wisely and pithily writeth) a generall storie cannot be understood by particular registers; and for that an Historiographers studie and endeavour ought to be employed rather in an universall treatise, than in particular discourses: therefore, least so great a peece of work as his, wanting a beginning, should seeme maimed & imperfect; in the formost 20 books he slightly & breifely ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the foundation of the citie, unto the beginning of the second Punick war. But Dionysius professing purposely to describe the auncient monuments of the Romanes, thought it his part to overpasse and omit nothing worthe of remembrance, but most curiously and exactly hath delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or discourses of affaires; in so much as those things whereof Livie hath scanty made three bookes, hee hath declared at large in eleven. Hereupon, if a man read in Dionysius, the auncient beginning and originall of the Roman empire, and examine well the times how they are by him digested, and compare the same with the brevity in Livie, no doubt he will preferre the diligence of the former before the overhastinesse of the later. But if the indifferent reader consider the purpose and intent of them both, he will yeeld unto either of them their due praise; and whereas Livie making hast to other matters, hath either let passe or more slightly handled some things, he will judge him worthe rather to be excused than reproved for it.

To these three causes above rehearsed, others also may be adjoined; namely, the ordering of the yeeres by Romulus, and the varietie as touching that yeere wherein Rome was founded: but it may suffice only to touch these, & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit this we thinke good to advertise and admonish the reader by the way; that albeit in the digesting and reckoning of the Coss, we have set before our eyes to follow the marble tables & monuments of Verrius Flaccus, and according thereunto have framed & applied the computation of the yeeres; yet that yeere before the 250, as also the other, which Verrius rejected, we have inserted with the rest, that our account might fall out just with the sum of the yeeres, as they are collected by Varro. Which, before us, Onuphrius Panvinus a most learned man hath done in his Kalender, thinking that the yeere which Verrius and they that followed him rased out was the 423, and therefore he hath put it to the rest without Consuls, according to the Capitoline records.

Of the computation of times usually observed by the Romanes, and of the yeere of the cities foundation.

He calculation of yeeres was taken and observed by men in old time divers and sundrie wayes. The Achæans (as wee read) received it from the revolution of the starres: the Argives from their women priests; as for example, if Chrysis such a yeere were chiefe priest to offer sacrifices, they counted the number of yeeres from the said Chrysis. But many have derived & fetched the course and consequence of their acts and affaires, from the yeeres before Troy was built, or else after the winning thereof. Howbeit, from the 408 yeere after the captivity thereof, by occasion of the Olympian games, which Hercules first instituted in the honour of his great grandfere by the mothers side, and which by his sonne Iphiclus (or Iphitus, as some will have it) were renewed that yeere: from that time (I say) they began to number the yeeres by the Olympiads, especially among the Grecians, whose storie (as Eusebius affirmeth) is not of any credit but from the time of the first Olympias. The Hebrewes (like as other nations in the East) received the denomination and reckoning of the yeeres from their kings. The Atheniens, from their Eponymi (as they called them) but that in their Archæresæ, [that is, the elections of their magistrates] which were wont to hold for certain daies about the beginning of the yeere, they counted in this wise, ἐπὶ πρῶτῃς πεντηκοντατῆς ἐτεῖς, i. the tenth or eleventh of the first Prytania. And hereof it seemeth, that the name comineth τῆς ἐκωνταμυρίας as if from thence, their acts received both the time and also the name. After the example of the Atheniens and others, the Romanes reckoned their daies, made their calender, and registred their acts by such and such Consuls; noting thereto otherwhiles the yeere from the cities foundation. Many about it there is much more diversitie in authors, than about that wherein the first Consuls took their government. And seeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not impertinent to this place, briefly wee will rehearse the opinions of authors as touching the time when the citie of Rome was founded.

To begin therefore at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer agoe and further off, Timæus Siculus (I know not upon what reason induced) hath recorded, how the citie was built by Romulus much about the time that Carthage in Atricke by the Tyrians, namely in the 38 yeere before the first Olympias.

L. Cincius (a Senatour of Rome by calling) saith it was in the fourth yeere of the twelfth Olympias. Q. Fabius Pictor (a most auncient writer of the Romane storie and of greatest credit) attributeth it to the first yeere of the eight Olympias.

Polybius Megapolitanus, and Diodorus Siculus, quote the second yeere of the 7 Olympias. Apollodorus, Q. Lutatius Catulus, C. Cornelius Nepos, Eratosthenes, M. Porcius Cato, Dionysius Halicarnasæus, & Theophilus Antiochenus, name the first yeere of the 7 Olympias.

M. Verrius Flaccus, (the avoucher of the Capitoline stone-records) T. Livius, C. Julius Solinus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth yeere of the 6 Olympias.

L. Taruntius Firmanus, M. Terentius Varro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Augustus Cæsar, C. Plinius Secundus, Plutarchus Chæronæus, Domitianus Cæsar Augustus, P. Cornel. Tacitus, Cassius Dio, A. Gellius, L. Septimius Severus Augustus, Censorinus, M. Julius Philippus Augustus, Eusebius Pamphil. Cæsariensis, Eutropius, Paulus Orosius, Paulus Diaconus Longibardus: and after the time of C. Cæsar Dictatour, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which wee also goe by) will have the citie to be founded the third yeere of the sixth Olympias.

But by what motives and reasons each one of these authours is induced, and whereby they would seeme to confirme their severall opinions, needlesse it is in this place for to declare: both because the speculation hereof pertaineth properly to another profession, and also for that (besides Plutarch in Romulus, Solinus in the 1 chapter of his Polyhistor, and Camers in his annotation thereupon) the question hath been so thoroughly handled by Onuphrius Panvinius in the first booke of his Calender, that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the citie of Rome was laid by Romulus, it was the eleventh day before the calends of May, called Parilia or Palilia. Now was this a festivall day to Pales the goddesse of shepheards, celebrated by the said shepherds upon the eleventh calends of Maie, in the fields and countrey villages, for the chafing away of wolves, for the preservation of their sheepe and cattell from diseases, or for the safe yeaning and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter writeth Propertius in his 4. booke in this wise:

*A feast there was, Palilia, our fath:rs did it call,
And on that day they first began, for Rome to build a wall.*

Ovid also in the fourth booke of his Fasti:

A time full meet they chose, with plough the plot to marke, Dame Pales was at hand, and so began the warke.

The same is avouched by M. Tullius, Plutarch, Solinus, and others. And that these Palilia were solemnized ordinarily the eleventh day before the calends of May, appeareth as well by the old marble Romane calenders, as also by the same authors before rehearsed.

Of the first soveraigne magistrates of the citie of Rome, namely, of the KK. who were in number seven.

LI sorts of policies and governments in a Common-weale which are set downe and named by auncient Writers, the citie of Rome (were it by the fatall course of destinie, or upon some troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: so as no common-weale in manner there can be found, wherein they succeeded so one after another, as they did in the very citie of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK. ruled it; but when they for their excessive outrage and inordinate lust exercised upon their citizens and subjects, were deposed and expelled, the Consuls (and after them the Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie) held the soveraigntie. But in proceesse of time, when this frame and forme of Common-weale (simply the best) was by the outrage of the two Gracchi (Saturninus and Drusus Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, untill such time as their power and authoritie was by Sylla rent in twain; & the Commons disleized of their lands and killed: then the administration of the common-weale was restored againe to the Nobles and principall persons of the citie. But at length when it was oppressed againe by the civill warre of Pompey and Cæsar, the soveraigne rule of the State was devolved upon the empire of Cæsar alone; wherein, being first shaken a few yeeres before, through the wicked insolencie and lust of the three Triumvirs, it continued untill the time that it fell to utter ruine. Wee therefore will briefly goe through all these sorts of government, in that successive order as they followed one after another, and first begin with the KK.

Romulus the first K. of the Romans, reigned 37 yeeres.

ROMULUS, the founder of the citie, reigned 37 yeeres: for so many Livie assigneth unto him. Likewise Dionysius in the first booke, which hee repeated also in the second: and Plutarch in Numa dissenteth not from them, howsoever in Romulus, hee writeth that hee departed this world in the 37 yeere of his age. Solinus in like manner, relieving his worthie actes, attributeth unto his reigne 37 yeeres. Onely Eutropius (1. booke 4. chap.) alloweth unto him 39 yeeres; but Cuspinian thinketh verie well, that the copie is corrupt. This prince having reigned (according to the more common received opinion of authors) seven and thirtie yeeres; in which time, hee laid the first ground-woke of the Roman Empire, with

with excellent lawes and ordinances, and established both civile & also militarie discipline, departed this life upon the Nones of Iulie, which day was called afterwards, None Caprotina: by occasion that he in multering and reviewing his armie at the lake of Capra, was conveighed out of mens fight: whereupon the people fled as amafed at the suddaine death of their king, as Plutarch and Dionysius doe witness. This Romulus after his *deification was named Quirinus, of which surname Ovid in his *Kalendar giveth these reasons.

* Apollonius.* Quirinus.Some read this, *Sive quod hasta quiris; priscis est dicta *Sabinis: Latinus. *Bellicus a telo, venit in *Astra Deus: Anna.* Romanus vi- *Sive sui regni nomen p'suere Quirites,*certat, huc et - *Sen quis *Romanus iunxerat ille Cives. Quirinus.

A speare, old Sabins Quiris cald, which Romulus us'd in fight: This martiall man a god became, & so Quirinus high. Quirites eke his subjects hege their K, this name might give: Or els the Cures, whō he broght with Romans for to live.

That hee was base borne, and could not avouch his owne father, beside other writers, Plutarch especially affirmeth in his Theseus. Howbeit the old opinion went currant, that he was by Mars begotten in stealth of a vestal virgin, Ilia, Rhea, or Sylvia, for so many names ther goe of her: and that first he was called Romus, of Ruma, which signifieth a teat or pap, and afterwards by way of flatterie, Romulus.

Interregents.

FOR one yeere after the death of Romulus, the nobles fell to variance, and strove who should be king: but by reason, that no one person excelled above the rest in that state so newly founded, there grew severall factions and debates in their head-corporations. They who wer descended from the Sabines (because after the death of Tatius none of them raigned with Romulus in equall societie) were desirous to have a king created out of their bodie, because they would not forgoe their hold and possession in the Empire. But the old Romanes could not away with a stranger-king. Howbeit, as different as they were in affections, al were willing to set up a king, as having not tasted yet the sweetnesse of libertie. The Peeres moreover mightily feared (by reason that the neighbour States bordering round about were provoked against them) least some forraigne force might assaile their cittie left thus without soveraign government, and the armie without a leader. Whereupon the two hundred nobles agreed among themselves to enter into an association of rule, and made ten Decuries: and in every Decurie created one to have the soveraigntie over the rest. These Senatours were then 100 in number, as Livie saith, and according to Plutarch a hundred & fiftie. But Dionysius writeth, that there were two hundred of the Sabines, and as many Romanes. After this they cast lots, and their Decurie unto whom the lotterie first fell, ruled the citie: howbeit not all of them at once, but one alone had the regall ornaments, and the listours going before him. Five daies hee governed and no longer; and so by this order in course, the nobles of every Decurie governed the citie fiftie daies. For after five daies determined, hee whose lot was first to governe in that Decurie, delivered up unto the second the imperiall dignitie together with the ensignes thereof: and hee againe, when his five daies were expired, unto a third, and so to the tenth. Thus when the tenn first Interregents had passed one 50 daies, a second Decurie of Senatours in like manner ruled the citie other 50 daies; and thus they went round through all untill they had fulfilled a yeeres space in this regencie. This government was of the thing it selfe called Interregnum, which name it still retained afterwards, and the men likewise were named Interreges. In this yeare therefore was the magistracie of Interregents first devised among the Romanes. And not onely after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregencie, but also after the decease of Numa, Tullius, & Ancus, kings. In like manner during the time of the free State & Commonweale, after the time of yeerly magistrates expired, the said government tooke place very often, before the creation of new: for they held the assembly for elections, wherein new governours were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this Interregent was, during the time of his regencie (which ordinarily passed not five daies) to execute all those functions in the citie, which belonged either to KK. or Consuls; namely, to minister justice, to rule the Commonweale, to hold a Senate, and there to propound the affairs of State, & lastly to summon the generall assembly for chusing new magistrates. As touching the beginning of Interregents, Dionysius in his second booke, Livie in his first, Plutarch in Numa, Sext. Rufus, Eusebius & other old writers, have written at large.

Numa Pompilius the second K. reigned 43 yeeres.

ONE yeere of Interregencie being thus accomplished, the people of Rome thought this this a greevous and heave manner of government; and the Commons grumbled that their servitude was many-fold more than before, as having two hundred lords over them in stead of one. Which when the Senatours perceived, they agreed at last upon this point, That the old Senatours should create a king, whome they would, so hee were not one of their owne bodie and degree. Whereupon Numa Pompilius (for that in justice & wisdom he excelled all other) was called out of Cures a cittie of the Sabines, to bee their king. That hee reigned three and fortie yeeres, all accord, save Eutropius, Eusebius and Cassiodorus (late writers) who set downe but one and fortie, as Onuphrius and Sigonius have observed. Of this king, Dionysius in the second booke, Livie in his first, Solinus in his second chapter, Plutarch, Plinie, and Eutropius in his life; in like sort, Valerius Maximus have delivered much in record. Hee died not much above the age of eightie yeeres as Plutarch writeth; for born he was (as he testifieth) the same day whereon Romulus laid the first foundation of the citie, namely, the twelfth Calends of May. Now for the name of Numa, some say it was the fore-name of Pompilius. But out of Sextus Pompeius it appeareth, that neither Tullius nor Numa were fore-names, as also by this conjecture, for that the sonnes of Numa are by Dionysius called by other sundry names diverse from the familie. Some thought therefore that Numa, Ancus, Aruns, Volulus, Drusus, Faustus, Iulus, Mammurius, & certain other surnames, were at first forenames, as Marlianus in his Annales hath verie well noted.

Tullus Hostilius the third king of Rome, reigned 32 yeeres.

NUMA being deceased, the Interregencie tooke place again: during which time an act of Senat passed, wherein by the approbation of the Commons and advise of the nobles, Tullus Hostilius was created the third king of the Romans, in the fourescore and one yeere after the foundation of the citie. Who having rased Alba, commaunded the Albans to be translated to Rome. Their Commons hee made free denizens, and the principal nobles hee tooke into the order of Senators. After Numa he reigned 32 yeeres, as all writers most constantly affirm. He perished as Dionysius witnesseth, by occasion that his house was on fire, wherein his wife & children & all their houhold besides were consumed and burnt. Some say, that his pallace tooke fire by lighting through the ire of the gods, for that hee had forlet some sacrifices and holy rites: others write, that it was occasioned by the treacherous practise of Ancus Martius, who reigned next after him. Of him Dionysius writeth in his 3 booke. That hee carried before him the name of Hostus it appeareth by this, that both his father and grandfire bare the said name. A prince hee was, not onely farre unlike to Numa, but also more fierce and stout than Romulus.

Ancus Martius the fourth K. of Romanes, reigned 24 yeeres.

King Tullius beeing departed this life, there was an Interregent by the Nobles declared, who held the assembly for Election in the 114 yeere from the foundation of the city: wherein the people created Ancus Martius the fourth K. of the Romanes, and the Senatours approved the same. He built Hostia a town 16 miles distant from the citie of Rome; and fought seven battels. Livius, Dionysius, and Solinus say, that he reigned 24 yeeres; but Eusebius, Eutropius, and Cassiodorus, 23. What death hee died, neither Livie in his first booke, nor Dionysius in his 3, do set down: notwithstanding that by them his noble acts are set out at large. Now Ancus (as Sex. Pompeius hath reported) is hee called, who hath an arme bowing inward, so as it cannot be put straight forth.

L. Tarquinius Priscus the fifth K. of Romanes, reigned 38 yeeres.

His Tarquinius beeing left by Ancus (when he died) guardian to his children, was the first that ambitiously intercepted the kingdome to himselfe; hee sent the sonnes of Ancus, during the time of Interregencie, out of the way, as it were to hunting, and made an oration unto the people to win their harts & affections to him: & so with the suffrages of the people, and authoritie of the nobles, he was by the Interregent declared K. in the 170 yeere after the foundation of Rome, and in the 41 Olympias. This noble prince as wel for warlike prowesse as peaceable pollicie and government, at the length (being above fourescore yeere old) was forelaid by the secret traines of the two sonnes of Ancus Martius, in the eight and thirtie yeere of his raigne, according according to Livie & Dionysius, whose judgement we follow: or in the 37, as Solinus, Messala, Ruffus, Eutropius, Cassiodorus, Eusebius, and Bedas write; like as we have before shewed. Priscus hee was furnished afterwards, because hee lived before Tarquinius Superbus, sixth Sex. Pompeius, unto whom accord Dionysius and Laurentius Valla: who writeth, that the addition of Priscus was given unto him not by men of that time wherein hee lived, but by the age following. But Livie sheweth plainly, that he had the surname of Priscus given him, even then when he came first into the citie, because he was borne before Superbus. Hee also was called Lucumo, and was the sonne of Demaratus the Corinthian, descended from the familie of the Brachiades.

Servius Tullius the first K. of the Romans reigned fower and fortie yeeres.

After Priscus Tarquinius was slain, presently Servius Tullius was the first that (without any election of the people, yet with the general consent of the Nobles) tooke upon him the Romane kingdom, in the yeere from the foundation of the citie 176. Concerning whose conception, wee must not let passe that which Plinie writeth in the 36 booke after this manner. During the reigne of Tarquinius Priscus, there appeared suddenly the genital member of the masculine sex upon the hearth where the fire was kept, and thereupon presently a captive woman & bond-servant of Tanaquil the queen, named Ocrisia, sitting there by the fire side, conceived & was with child; and so was Servius Tullius borne, who succeeded in the kingdom. Afterwards as the boy lay asleep within the kings pallace, his head was seene on a light fire, and supposed he was the son of the familiar Lar of that house. In which regard, he instituted first the Compitalia and plaies to the Lares. Concerning his birth, Plutarch hath written more in his booke of the Romans fortune. By the craftie and subtil devise of his wives mother Tanaquil, he attained to the crowne in the fourth yeere of the fifth Olympias, and reigned 44 yeeres: but by the villanous complor of Tarquinius his sonne in law, and Tullia his owne daughter and Tarquins wife, hee was most impiously slaine in the verie street; which thereupon was called Sceleratus. As touching the yeeres of this kings reigne, some controversie there is among writ-ters: for Livie, Dionysius, and Solinus (whom wee have followed) write, that hee reigned 44 yeeres: but Messala Corvinus, Sex. Ruffus, Eutropius, Eusebius, Cassiodorus, and Bedas, 34, and not above. Howbeit, in adding those ten to the reigne of Tarquinius afterwards, they hinder not this grosse summe and computation of the yeeres: for they set them downe 35, which Livie, Dionysius, and Solinus, make but 25. This K. tooke the name of Servius, by occasion of his owne fortune, for that his mother Ocrisia a captive (but a most beautifull and wise woman of Corniculum) bare him during her bondage: but Tullius hee was called, by the name of his fathers kindred, as Dionysius writeth in his fourth booke, reckoning up many acts by him atchieved.

L. Tarquinius Superbus the seventh K. of Romans, ruled 25 yeeres.

IN the two hundred and twentieth yeare after the foundation of the citie, L. Tarquinius the younger having killed Servius Tullius, entered upon the Romane kingdom with force of armes, not by Interregent, ne yet any right of law. Superbus hee was named for his cruell demeanour, in that hee forbade to commit to earth the dead corps of his father in law, by him murdered; giving out that Romulus likewise died and lay unburied. Hee was the sonne of L. Tarquinius Priscus the king, as Q. Pictor, Au. Gellius, Licinius Macer, Verrius Flaccus and Livius have written. Howbeit Dionysius out of L. Piso in his Annales, by most strong reasons disproveth their error, and by the certaine computation of the yeeres sheweth how it cannot possibly be so, but rather that hee was the sonne of Tarquinius Priscus his sonne, who died in the life of Priscus. Five & twentie yeeres he reigned according to Livie in his first booke. Dionysius in his fourth, and Solinus in his Polyhistor. But Cassiodorus, Eusebius, Eutropius and Bedas, ascribe unto him five and thirtie yeeres, adding unto his raigne those ten yeeres which they tooke from Servius Tullius, and thereby giving occasion of error to the later writers. Of him Dionysius, Livie, both the Plinies, Gellius, Macrobius and Eutropius have written much. Collect then, into one summe the yeeres of these kings raigne, and thereof will arise the number of two hundred fortie foure.

His is the second change of the common-weale, by occasion that Superbus the K. as well for his insolent and proud government, as for the villanie offered by Sextus the kings sonne to Lucretia, was expelled, and libertie recovered: wherupon the soveraigne government yeer by yeere was committed to two men, who first were named Pretours, for that they were set over the people: then, Iudges, because they decided their controversies: and lastly Consuls, in that they advised and provided for the good of the common-weale: as Cicero in the third booke of Lawes declareth in these words: Let there be two invested in roiall government; and of ruling, judging, and counsell giving, be they called Pretours, Iudges, and Consuls: let them have also the soveraigntie of commaund in warre. Now the first Consuls or Pretors were created by Sp. Lucretius (father of Lucretia, and Interregent for the time) in a generall assembly by the voices of the Centuries, according to the commentaries of Servius Tullius the king. The first Consull had all the rights, prerogatives, and regall ensignes of the KK. this onely provided, that both of them should not have the rods and axes carried before them, for feare of presenting any terror to the people. Both of them were chosen out of the Patritij: which for this intent I advertise the Reader of, that the progresse of the common-weale might be knowne; seeing that in processe of time they came to be created out of the commons also. Moreover, as concerning the yeere, moneth, and day, when as the first Consuls entred their government, something were to be said in this place: but because we have spoken before of the varietie and diffention of Authors thereabout; therefore letting passe these circumstances, proceed wee to the very Consuls, who by the testimony of all writers were first chosen; namely,

L. Iunius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus.

IT is recorded by all writers, that L. Iunius Brutus, & L. Tarq. Collatinus, were the first Coss. or Pretors of the Rom. people: who in the end of the 244 yeer since the foundation of the citie, and upon the first day of March (after the Tarquins KK. the father & the son were expelled the citie) in an assembly of the Centuries were solemnly pronounced and declared Coss. But after that Brutus had compelled his colleague Tarquinius to resign up his Consulship, either because hee was suspected for the affinitye and name of the Tarquins (as L. Piso in Gellius the 15 booke and 29 cap. Livie, Plutarch, & Cic. 3. Offic. doe write:) or by occasion of a variance between Brutus and Collatinus about the execution of Collatinus his sisters sonne, (as Dionysius reporteth) hee subelected in his place Pub. Valerius Volusus the sonne of Volusus, whose helping hand hee had used especially in banishing the KK. Of whose Consulship, Po-lybius in the third booke, Dionysius, Livie, Valerius Max. 4 booke 4 chap. Plutarch in Poplicola, and Plinie 36 booke chap. 15, have made mention. But Valerius, after that Brutus in his magistracie was slaine by Aruns the sonne of Superbus (for the king his father had levied warre against the Romans) in a generall court of all the Centuries, tooke unto him for his companion in government, Sp. Lucretius Triptitinus the father of Lucretia; and to him (being the elder) submitted the preheminance of soveraigntie. And soone after, within few daies upon his death, (for hee was very aged) hee assumed unto him M. Horatius Pulvillus for his colleague in the Consulship. The said Valerius was called Poplicola, for that during his magistracie, he enacted certaine lawes very popular, and namely, concerning the appeale from the Consuls to the people, and the receiving of the state-government from the said people, as Livius and Dionysius do witnes. In the vulgar bookes bookes, as also in the old written copies (whether by error or of purpose I wote not) wee read his name evermore Publicola, but still in one and the same signification. Only the letters are a little altered, which otherwise have much affinitye one with another, as Quintilian writeth, namely o with u, and p with b. For in antique titles and inscriptions, you shall read often Poplicus for Publicus. To conclude therefore, in the first yeere after the KK. were exiled, Coss. at Rome were these, L. Iunius Brutus, and Lu. Tarq. Collatinus, P. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, & M. Horatius Pulvillus.

P. Valerius II. T. Lucretius.

THe Consulship of these two is recorded unto us by Dionysius, Livius, and Cassiodorus. Onuphrius Panvinius, giveth unto Lucretius the surname of Tricipitinus, both for that it was a peculiar addition to that house; & also, because by an ancient Chronologer in the records of Cuspinian, he is named Tricipitinus. Now for Publius, the Etymologie therof according to Sextus, is twofold. For some call him Pub. who hath ben brought up at the publicke charges: others again name him so, who was a ward before hee had his name given him.

P. Lucretius. P. Valerius Poplicola.

Livius calleth this Lucretius by the for-name of P. but other booke of Titus Dionysius writeth, that P. Valerius Poplicola the third time, and M. Horatius the second time were Coss. Plutarch speaketh of the third Consulship only of P. Valerius. Onuphrius and Sigonius follow Dionysius. As for Cassiodorus, hee leaveth out altogether these Consuls.

Sp. Lartius. T. Herminius.

After Poplicola the third time, and Pulvillus the second time Consuls, Dionysius hath placed Sp. Lartius & T. Herminius. The same dooth Cassiodorus. And the booke noted by Cuspinian, under an unknowne author, hath in it thus written, Poplicola III. & Pulvillo; Ruso & Aquilino; Valerio & Tuberto. Livie omitte these Consuls, & in their place putteth downe M. Valerius and P. Posthumus: but as Sigonius thinketh, the fault is in the writers of the booke.

But that this yeere should necessarily come betweene, Onuphrius thinketh, according to the booke of M. Tullius Cicero entituled Brutus: and certain it is, that Verrius Flaccus in his Capitoline tables hath not rejected these Consuls. Now this name Lartius is derived of Lars, and so ought it to be written, and not Largius, as corruptly it is to be seen in some copies of Livie and Dionysius. As for the surname to Herminius, Onuphrius supposeth it to have been Esquilinus, both for that the mention of that surname appeareth in a fragment of the Capitoline marbles, as also because of what familie els it should be, no writer ever hath delivered. This Sp. Lartius was the brother of Titus Lartius the first Dictator, as writeth Dionysius.

M. Valerius. P. Postumius.

Plutarch, as also Dionysius and Livius, writeth, that this M. Valerius was brother to M. Valerius Publicola, and therefore truly is he said to be the son of Volusus Postumius for his surname had Tuberius. Witnesse Zonaras, together with Plutarch in Poplicola, and Dionysius in the fifth and sixth bookes. Him Dionysius calleth the brother of Quintus, where hee treateth of the Consular embassadours sent unto the Commons in the yeere 260. This Postumius as Onuphrius teacheth, was by old authors written without the aspiration (h) either because of Postea, Postumus, and Postimius, and so Postumius is derived, or for that in old time they wrote umius without the said (h). Now is he called Postumius, who was borne last, as Cesellius witnesse in his commentaries of ancient readings. Howbeit, lawyers pronounce the word with the aspiration, and call by that name him only, who was born after his fathers death: and with them accord Varro, and Plutarch in the life of Sylla.

P. Valerius III. T. Lucretius.

Dionysius, Livius, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus report these for Coss. this yeere. But the registers of Cuspinian deliver unto us Poplicola the fourth time, and Tricipitinus. Valerius Maximus in the fourth booke and fourth chapter writeth thus, Valerius Poplicola began his Consulship with Brutus, & the same man bare three Consulates afterwards, to the great contentment of the people.

251

Agrippa Meneius. P. Postumius.

Dionysius hath for Coss. this yeere, Agrippa Meneius L. natius, & L. Postumius the second cond time. Livie, Cassiodorus, Cuspinians booke, and the Greek records disagree not from him. Valerius Max. 4. booke, 4. cap. corruptly calleth him M. Meneius Agrippa. Now Agrippa are they called, who are born into the world with extraordinarie throwes and birth-travels of their mothers, namely, not with their heads, but their feet forward, against nature.

Opiter Virginus. Sp. Caisius.

Livius, Zonaras, & Cassiodorus, name these Consuls barely thus. Dionysius yet is more liberally, calling Sp. Caisius, Vscellinus; & Opiter Virginus, Tricostus. But whome Dionysius calleth σοκελινον, Cicero in his Laelius tearmeth Caisius Becellinus. And Cuspinians kalender, Vscellinus. For first of Viscus commeth Vscellus, & so from thence they derive Vscellinus. Opiter (to note that by the way, as Sex. Pompeius saith) is hee, whose father died before his grandfire. And the word foundeth thus much, as if hee were born after his fathers death; or because he taketh his grandfire for his father.

Postumius Cominus. T. Lartius.

Livie, Dionysius, Zonaras, and Cassiodorus name these simply thus. But Cuspinians Kalender, giveth to Postumius the surname Auruncus, and to Lartius, Ruffus. And those whome Cuspinians booke nameth Ruffi, the Greek registers by another word but to the same sence, call Flavi.

Ser. Sulpitius. M. Tullius.

Livie and Cassiodorus allow to these no surnames at all. The Sicilian records give to Sulpitius the addition of Camerinus, like as the Kalender of Cuspinian; and to Tullius of Longus: as also doth Dionysius, who writeth, that Manius Tullius died in the time of his magistracie, & that in his place there was none substituted, because the yeer was welneer at an end. Of this M. Tullius, Cicero speaketh in his Brutus, saying, As if I should avouch my selfe to be descended of M. Tullius the Parritian, who in the tenth yeere after the expulsion of the KK. was Coss. with Ser. Sulpitius. This surname Manius, as Sex. Pompeius saith, commeth hereupon, that some one was born mane, i. in the morning, like as Lucius, who entred into the world by day light. And in another place, this Manius (qd. he) consecrated the field Nemorensis, from whom

C. Vetusius. T. Ebutius.

The forename of this Vetusius or Veturius in some copies of Livie, as Marlian sheweth in his annales of Consuls, is Caius: in other Cneus: in Cassiodorus, Lucius: in Dionysius Publius: who also surnameth Veturius, Geminus: and T. Ebutius, Helus; and in some place ελαλλεον, but faultily; for the Latin writers also affirm his surname to be Helus. The Greeke records likewise have Helus and Geminus. Moreover, they that write him Vetusius, imitate the auncient manner of putting v for r, as when they call men Fusij, Valesij, & Papisij. But they who call him Veturius follow the latter usage. Of this matter Livie speaketh in the yeere 292.

Q. Cladius. T. Lartius.

Thus say Livie and Cassiodorus: but Dionysius surnameth T. Lartius, Flavius; and Q. Cladius, Siculus: to whom accord the registers both of Cuspinian & Sicilie. This T. Lartius is the same, as appeareth by Dionysius, who before was Consul: and therefore is his surname Flavius rightly added. The house of the Cladij, as also of the Iulij, Servilij, Geganij, Curatij and Quintilij descended from the Albanes first, as Dionysius writeth.

257

Au. Sempronius. M. Minutius.

Thus Livie and Cassiodorus deliver unto us these Coss. But Cuspinians registers and the Sicilian, surname them Atratinus and Augurinus. And Dionysius nameth them A. Sempronius Rhetinus, and M. Minutius Augurinus, albeit he maketh no mention of Augurinus; but in the second Consulship of Minutius. As for Aulus hee was so called, who being new borne, was nourished and fostered by the gods.

Au. Postumius. T. Virginus.

Thus are these Coss. set down by Dionysius, Livie, and Cassiodorus. And to them verily the Greek records put to the surnames of Albus and and Cælimontanus. But the booke of Cuspinian ad Regillensis and Tricoftus besides: so that by him they are thus written, Au. Posthumus Albus Regillensis, & T. Virginus Tricoftus Cælimontanus.

App. Claudius and P. Servilius.

Livius and Cassiodorus record these for Consuls this year. The registers as well of Cuspinian as Sicilie, Sabinus and Priscus: But Dionysius more fully, App. Claudius Sabinus, and P. Servilius Priscus. This App. Claudius was the top of the Claudian kindred, first named Actius Clausus, and afterwards App. Claudius; who from Regillus, a citie of the Sabines (whereupon he was called Sabinus Regillensis) came to Rome in the two hundred and fiftieth yeere after the foundation of the citie, and was raunged among the Patrii, as Livie, Dionysius, and Suetonius in Tiberius make report. This man was grandfire to that App. Claudius the Decemvir. As touching his forename, there is some difference; whereof ye may see Onuphrius and Marlianus in their Kalendars.

A. Virginus and T. Vetustius.

These are thus set downe by Livie & Cassiodorus, as here they be named. Dionysius writeth them, Au. Virginus Montanus, and T. Veturius Geminus. The register of Cuspinian, barely Montanus and Geminus. The Sicilian, Calimontanus and Geminus. Montanus and Cælimontanus are both one. Pædianus upon the Oration of Cicero for Cornelius, calleth these Consuls, Au. Virginus Tricoftus, & L. Veturius Cicurinus: whereby it may be understood, that both of them had two surnames; to wit, the one, Tricoftus Cælimontanus; and the other, Geminus Cicurinus; for so elsewhere other writers testifie. Cuspinianus observeth, that this Cicurinus, is also called Coturnius by some writers.

Sp. Cassius and Postumus Cominius.

So Livius and Dionysius. Of them speaketh Cicero also in his Oration for Cornelius. But Cuspinian his booke set forth unto us, Viscellinus and Auruncius. The Sicilian records, Aruncius and Vitellinus. And that these same were Consuls together in this yeere, and entred upon their government the first of September, sooner than the custome was, as Dionysius writeth.

T. Geganius and P. Minutius.

Dionysius in the beginning of the seventh booke nameth for Consuls this yeere, T. Geganius Macerinus, and P. Minutius. The same doth Livius in the second booke. Cassiodorus likewise and Eutropius. Orofius also in the second booke & fift chapter, leaving out one of their surnames. But the Greeke records and Cuspinians booke surrname them both, the one Macerinus, the other Angurinus. And these are ordinarie surnames, this to the Minutij, and the former to the Geganij.

M. Minutius and Au. Sempronius.

So Livie and Cassiodorus set them downe, omitting their surnames, as also the nummell note II. But Dionysius recordeth them fully in this manner, A. Sempronius Stratinus the second time, & M. Minutius Angurinus likewise the second time. This yeere reckoneth Dionysius for the nineteenth, after that Poplicola the Confull published the law of appealing.

Sp. Nautius and Sex. Furius.

After Au. Sempronius and M. Minutius Consuls, Dionysius bringeth in to succeed them, Q. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Sp. Lartius Flavius the second time. Cuspinian registers, Cornutus and Flavius: the Sicilian, Camerinus and Flavius. Moreover, Cornutus also is an ordinarie surname to the Sulpitij, as may be gathered out of the Capitoline tables of stone. And that these Consuls are not to be left out, either according to the account of the Capitoll, or to make up and digest the summe gathered by Varro, appeareth by the triumph of P. Valerius, which would not fall to the yeere 279, if wee should deduct these Consuls out of the Kalender.

265

T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius.

Next after the former Consuls, there followed according to Dionysius, C. Iulius Iulus and P. Pinarus Rufus Consuls. Cuspinian

L. Æmilius. K. Furius.

Livie avoucheth Consuls for this yeere, Sp. Cassius and Proculus Virginus: and Dionysius, Sp. Cassius the second time, with Proculus Virginus. And Diodorus in his eleventh booke, unto Virginus addeth the name Tricoftus. The Greeke records, as also those of Cuspinian, make mention of Rutilius and Viscellinus. Now as concerning the name of Proculus, some think they be so called, for that they were born when their parents were old, quasi, Procul atate progressi, i. farre steep in yeeres.

M. Fabius. L. Valerius.

Diodorus in the said 11 booke, declareth Q. Fabius Vibulanus, and Servius Cornelius Cossus, for this yeeres Consuls. The same doe Dionysius, Livie, and Cassiodorus, saving that they leave out the surnames. But as touching the surname of Cossus, (that yee may be resolved) men were named Cossi in the old time, who had riveld and wrinkled bodies, like to the wood-wormes breeding in trees, called Cossi. Plinius in his 17 book and 24 chap. saith: Royot and wantonneffe hath brought up the use at the table of the daintier wood-wormes breeding in oaks. Hereupon Saint Hierome against Iovinian: In Pontus (quoth hee) and Phrygia, it is counted high and delicate fare to eat Xylophagion: for so he calleth those plumpe and fat wormes which came of rotten wood, and among them are reckoned to yeeld a great revenue and commoditie to the housekeeper. Of them the Romanes tooke their names of Cossi, Cossutij, Cossunij, and Cassutiani.

Q. Fabius. C. Iulius.

Livius Æmilius the sonne of Mamercus, and Cæso Fabius the sonne of Cæso, are by Dionysius recorded the Consuls of this yeere. Livie and Cassiodore approve the same. Diodorus likewise, saving that hee addeth to L. Æmilius the surname of Mamercus: but they leave out the fore-names of their fathers. The Greeke records have Mamercus and Fabius. As for the surname of Mamercus, Dionysius giveth it unto Æmilius himselfe in his third Consulship. Moreover, Sex. Pompeius affirmeth, that the kindred Æmilia tooke name of Mamercus the sonne

Q9999

Cuspinian his records deliver unto us, Iulus and Mamercinus: but the Greeke, Iulus and Rufus. And that Mamercus is a surname to the Pinarum, appeareth by another place. These Consuls Livie over-passeth, like as the other the yeere before: upon whome, they that undertooke the explication of the Capitoline tables have noted, that there want Consuls for two yeeres. So that of himselfe the like may be said to that which he writeth in the ninth booke of Piso, in this manner [These Consuls, Piso bringeth in immediatly after Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out two yeeres whereof wee have reported that Claudius & Volumnius were Consuls in the one, and Cornelius with Martius in the other.] Whether he forgot them in the digesting of the Annales, or of purpose passed by them (notwithstanding he thought of those two couple of Consuls) it is uncertein. Moreover, the surname of C. Iulius, was transformed every where into Tullius and Tullius; but that it is to be read Iulus, both Marlianus and also after him Panvinus sheweth. For this surname Iulus is set from Afcianus the sonne of Æneas, and from the said surname is derived the denomination of a familie; and therefore Virgill saith,

The Iulian house: at Rome, first came From Iulus great, a prince of name.

And Livie speaking of the same in this wise saith; Which Iulus, the house of the Iulij avouch for the author of their name.

Sp. Cassius. Proculus Virginus.

But to leave these things; Sp. Nautius and Sex. Furius, are by Dionysius, Livius, and Cassiodorus raunged Consuls in this yeere. In Cuspinian his Annales, there is Rutilius, the surname of Nautius, and likewise Viscellinus. But in the Sicilian, Nautius and Furius.

Servius Cornelius. Q. Fabius.

Acording to Livie, the Consuls this yeere were T. Sicinius, and C. Aquilius; whome Dionysius and Cassiodorus name to be T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius. The surnames of these, by the Greeke records and Cuspinians Kalender, were Tusius and Sabinus. As for Aquilius, hee was so called (as Marlianus observeth) who was aquilo colore; i. of a dusky blacke, or brownish colour.

sonne of Pythagoras the Philosopher, who for his singular humanitie and courtesie, was surnamed Aemilius. But as he saith, Aemilius is a name and not a surname. Now was this Aemilius the sonne of Mamercus, as witnesseth Dionysius.

K. Fabius. Sp. Furius.

Dionysius hath for this yeeres Coss. Marchus Fabius Vibulanus, and L. Valerius Potitus. Dionysius, Livius, and Cassiodorus, M. Fabius and L. Valerius. The Greeke records, Fabius and Volusius: and finally Cuspinians booke, Fabius and Potitus.

M. Fabius. Cn. Manlius.

Dionysius matcheth together in the Consulship this yeere, C. Iulius and Q. Fabius. Livius and Cassiodorus, Q. Fabius and Caius Iulius. The Sicilian registers and Cuspinian, Iulus and Fabius.

K. Fabius. T. Virginus.

Dionysius writeth, that Caso Fabius the second time, and Sp. Furius Medullinus were Consuls this yeere: but Livie and Cassiodorus put in stead of them, Q. Fabius and C. Iulius. The Sicilian registers, as also Cuspinian, Iulus and Fabius.

L. Aemilius. C. Servilius.

By the testimonie of Dionysius, there followed Consuls next after, M. Fabius the second time, and C. Manlius. But Diodorus, Livius, and Cassiodorus, deliver unto us M. Fabius and Cn. Manlius for Consuls. The Greeke records, name Fabius the second time, and Cincinnatus. Cuspinians booke hath Vibulanus the second time. The Capitoline stone sheweth, Cn. Manlius the sonne of Publius.

C. Horatius. T. Menenius.

Livius, Cassiodorus, Diodorus, and Dionysius, make report of Caso Fabius to have been Consul this yeere with T. Virginus: but the Sicilian registers, Fabius with Rutilus. Dionysius noteth that Caso the brother of the Cof, who gave up his place, was a third Consul this yeere. And Livie saith, that T. Virginus Ru- tilus died in time of the pestilence the 290 yeere.

A. Virginus. Sp. Servilius.

According to Livie, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, the Consuls this yeere were L. Aemilius and C. Servilius: but Diodorus nameth, Lu. Aemilius Mamercus with C. Cornelius Lentulus: the Sicilian registers, Aemilius with Esquilinus. Another fragment of the Capitoline stone, onely Strutius Abala: with Esquilinus substituted in his rouble. Moreover, Mamercus (as Sext. Pompeius writeth) is an Olcane fore-name; who also reporteth, that the House Aemilia was so called of Mamercus the sonne of Pythagoras the Philosopher, who for his passing courtesie was surnamed Aemilius.

C. Nautius. P. Valerius.

Livius, Cassiodorus, Dionysius, and Diodorus, put down for Consuls, T. Menenius and C. Horatius. As for Diodorus, he addeth unto Horatius the surname of Pulvillus: and the Capitoline stone surnameth Menenius, Lanatus. And even so, both in Cuspinians Kalender & the Sicilian registers, are to be seen Lanatus and Pulvillus. Of these Consuls, Gellius maketh mention in the 17 booke and 21 chap. but not without fault.

Livius, Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, set downe for Consuls, A. Virginus and Spurius Servilius. Diodorus, A. Virginus Tricosus, and C. Servilius Strutius. In Cuspinian his Kalender, Virginus, for his surname hath Rutilus: and the Capitoll marbles, give Strutius to Servilius: the Sicilian records have both.

L. Aemilius. Opiter Virginus, or, Vopiscus Iulius.

Livie and Cassiodorus dominate for this yeeres Coss. P. Valerius and C. Nautius. Dionysius, P. Valerius Poplicola and C. Nautius. Diodorus, P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Nautius Rufus. The Sicilian registers thus, Nautius and Poplicola. Cuspinian, Poplicola and Rufus. The Capitoll stones, have for Rufus, Rutilus, like as Dionysius before in Lutius, for Rufus putteth downe Flavius.

L. Pinarius. P. Furius.

Diodorus this yeere nameth for Consuls, Li. Rapius Medullinus and M. Manlius Volsus. Livius and Cassiodorus, record L. Furius and C. Manlius. Dionysius commeth with A. Manlius and Lu. Furius. Marlianus giveth warning to read Volsus, not Volsus.

App. Claudius sonne of Appius. T. Quintus.

Dionysius would have L. Aemilius Mamercus to be Consul the third time this yeere, with Vopiscus Iulius: but Livie, L. Aemilius and Opiter Virginus. Howbeit, he saith that in some Annales hee found Vopiscus Iulius, in stead of Virginus. And them, Diodorus, the Greeke records, and the avouchers of the Consuls tables within the Capitoll, have followed. In the fragments wherof is read Iulius, which is a surname of the Iulij. And therefore in the Sicilian registers, it is thus written, Aemilius and Iulius: but in those of Cuspinian, Mamercus and Vopiscus. Cassiodorus hath followed Livie. Moreover, Appius is a peculiar name of the Claudy, which no citizen els of Rome used: because it was a strangers name.

L. Valerius. T. Aemilius.

Livius, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, name for this yeeres Consuls, L. Pinarius, and Lu. Furius. Diodorus, L. Penarius Mamertinus, and P. Furius Quappov, but faultily, as Sigonius and Onuphrius think. Of these Coss. M. Varro maketh mention, & Macrobius in the first booke of the Saturnalia.

283

T. Numicius Priscus. A. Virginus.

Dionysius saith, the Consuls of this yeere were App. Claudius the sonne of Appius, surnamed also Sabinus, and T. Quintus Capitolinus. Livie leaveth out their surnames.

284

T. Quintus. P. Servilius.

Livie and Cassiodorus set downe for Consuls this yeere, T. Aemilius and L. Valerius. Diodorus, L. Valerius Poplicola, and T. Aemilius Mamercus. Dionysius, L. Valerius the second time, and T. Aemilius. The Sicilian registers yeeld us nothing but the bare names, Aemilius and Valerius; but Cuspinian, Potitus and Mamercus.

T. Aemilius. Q. Fabius.

Dionysius hath for Consuls this yeere, A. Virginus Montanus (whom the Greeke records call Calimontanus) and T. Numicius Priscus. Diodorus, Livius, and Cassiodorus, conceale their surnames: and whome the Sicilian registers name Calimontanus, Cuspinian calleth Nomentanus.

286

Q. Servilius. Sp. Posthumus.

IN Dionysius wee read for this yeeres Consuls, T. Quintus Capitolinus, and Q. Servilius Priscus. Livius and Cassiodorus are silent for their surnames: but in Diodorus there bee T. Quintus, and Q. Servilius Strutius. In Cuspinians Kalender, Capitolinus and Priscus in the Sicilian registers, Calimontanus and Priscus.

Q. Fabius. T. Quintus.

Livius and Cassiodorus match together in Consulship for this yeere, T. Aemilius and Q. Fabius. Dionysius, T. Aemilius the 11 time, and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian registers, Aemilius & Vibulanus. Cuspinian, Mamercus and Vibulanus. Diodorus, Aemilius Mamercus & Q. Fabius Vibulanus. This is that Fabius who afterwards was foure times Consul, and was the onely Fabius that survived, when the Fabij were slaine at Cremera: not a child at that time of fourteene yeers of age, but a serviceable & an active man of his hands, (as Dionysius reporteth) and was the son of Marcus, a man who had been Consul.

A. Posthumus Albinus. Sp. Furius Fusus.

This yeere had for Consuls, Q. Servilius and Sp. Posthumus, as Livie and Cassiodorus report: but Priscus and Albinus, as Cuspinian saith. And by Dionysius his testimonie, Sp. Posthumus Albinus, and Q. Servilius Priscus the second time: but Diodorus nameth Q. Servilius and Sp. Posthumus Albinus. Howbeit, in the fragment of the Capitoll mayble, Sp. Posthumus is surnamed Albus Regillensis, and not Albinus, and so Marlian thinketh it ought to bee read.

Qggggg ij

L. Ebutius. P. Servilius.

Livius nameth T. Quintius and Q. Fabius. Cassiodorus, T. Quintius the second time, and Q. Fabius the second time. Diodorus, T. Quintius Capitolinus and Q. Fabius. Dionysius T. Quintius Capitolinus the third time, and Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time.

L. Lucretius Tricipitinus. T. Veturius Geminus.

According to the Capitoline table, Aulus Posthumus; out of Livie, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, Pub. Furius Fusus, are noted for Consuls this yeere. Diodorus putteth to Furius, the other gentile surname Medallinus for Fusus. This An. Posthumus was the sonne of A. Posthumus the Dictatour.

P. Volumnus. Serv. Sulpitius.

Livie and Cassiodorus write, that there followed as Coss. this yeere, P. Servilius; but Dionysius nameth L. Aebutius and P. Servilius Priscus. Diodorus, Lu. Aebutius Elva and Pub. Servilius Strallus. The Sicilian registers shew Priscus and Flavius; Cuspinian, Elva and Priscus. The Capitoll stones exhibit unto us, P. Servilius the sonne of Sp. P. N. i. the sonnes sonne of Publius, and surnamed Priscus.

C. Claudius sonne of Appius. P. Valerius Poplicola.

Livie, Cassiodore, and Denis, represent unto us as Consuls this yeere, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Veturius or Vetusius Geminus; but Diodorus, L. Lucretius and T. Veturius Cicerinus. Cuspinian his Kalender, Geminus and Tricipitinus. The Sicilian registers, Tricipitinus and Veturius; the Capitoline monuments L. Lucretius Tricipitinus.

Q. Fabius Vibulanus III. L. Cornelius Maluginensis.

Livius and Cassiodorus professe for Consuls this yeere, P. Volumnus and Serv. Sulpitius. Dionysius, P. Volumnus, and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus. The Capitoll marbles have P. Volumnus Amintinus Gallus. Of the same Consuls Valerius speaketh, in his first book and sixt chapter.

L. Minutius. C. Nautius.

Livie and Dionysius name, P. Valerius Publicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus Consuls for this yeere: Diodorus, P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Regillanus. The Sicilian registers and Cuspinian, call them Poplicola and Sabinus. The Capitoline marble hath this record, P. Valerius P. F. [sonne of P.] Volusi N. i. the sonnes sonne of Volusus, surnamed Poplicola; but Livie, Dionysius, Orosius, and they that have rainged the Consuls in the Capitoll, have reported that P. Valerius the Consull was slaine in the battell against the bondslaves, who this yeere (under the leading of Ap. Herdonius the Sabine) held the Capitoll by force, and that in his stead L. Quintius Cincinnatus was substituted.

Q. Minutius. C. Horatius Pulvillus.

Livius, together with Cassiodorus, declare for Consuls this yeere, Q. Fabius the third time, and L. Cornelius Maluginensis. Dionysius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius. Diodorus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, and L. Cornelius Nepotius. The Sicilian registers, and Cuspinian, Vibulanus and Maluginensis. The Capitoll marble, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time.

M. Valerius. Sp. Virginus.

Both Livie and Cassiodore, deliver unto us for Consuls, L. Minutius and C. Nautius. Dionysius, L. Minutius and C. Nautius the second time. Diodorus, L. Minutius Nepotius, and C. Nautius Rutilius. The Capitoll stones, C. Nautius Rutilius the second time. What this surname Nepotius should meane, Sigonius and Onuphrius confesse they know not, and thinke in stead thereof, wee should read Nepotius. Valerius Maximus (5 booke 2 chap. Of thankfull persons) writeth these Consuls corruptly, Q. for Nautius, and Minutius.

297

T. Romilius. Sp. Veturius.

Livie and Cassiodorus name for Coss. this yeere, Q. Minutius & M. Horatius Pulvillus; but herein they do amisse, as Sigonius & Onuphrius suppose: for the same Livie writeth, that Caius Horatius Pulvillus died beeing Augure in in the yeere 302. Diodorus nameth L. Posthumus and M. Horatius. Dionysius, Q. Horatius and Q. Minutius. The Capitoll records, C. Horatius Pulvillus. And the Sicilian registers, pulvillus and Augurinus.

Sp. Tarpeius. A. Aterius.

IN Livie, Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, we find Coss. this yeere, M. Valerius with Sp. Virginus. But in the twelfth booke of Diodorus, M. Valerius Lactuca, and Sp. Virginus Tricostus. In Cuspinians Kalender Maximus and C. Alimontinus. In the Sicilian, Maximus and Virginus. In that of the Capitoll, M. Valerius Max. As for Lactucinus, Plinie sheweth, that it is a surname of the Valerij. Of these Consuls also, Censorinus maketh mention in his discourse of the plaies called Seculares.

P. Curiatius. Sext. Quintilius.

According to Livie, Cassiodorus and Dionysius, this yeere, C. Veturius and T. Romilius entred upon the Consullship. Diodorus delivereth unto us C. Veturius Cicunus, and T. Romilius Vaticanus. Cuspinians kalender sheweth Geminus and Vaticanus. The Sicilian, Rocius and Veturius. The Capitoline records, T. Romilius, son of T. nephew or sonnes sonne of T. Vaticanus. Of the same Romilius, Plinie speaketh also, 7. booke, chapter 28.

T. Menenius. P. Sestius Capitolinus.

Spurius Tarpeius sonne of M. and nephew of M. surnamed Montanus Capitolinus, the kalender of Verrius Flaccus sheweth unto us for one Consull this yeere. Of whom, Diodorus, Dionysius, Livie, Pedianus upon Cicero his Oration for Cornelius, and Cassiodorus make mention, save onely the surnames. Cuspinians booke, and the Greeke records, have Capitolinus. As for his Colleague, they dissent and disagree. For Diodorus would have him to bee Aulus Aterius Fontinalis; but Dionysius Aulus Termentius. Livie and Plinie, the seventh booke, chapter seven and twentie, A. Aterius. Solinus chapter 4. Gell. 1 booke, chapter 11. A. Thermus. Lastly, Cassiodorus, Au. Aterius. Whom Sigonius and Onuphrius follow.

App. Claudius. T. Genucius.

Livie and Cassiodorus likewise, report for this yeere Consuls, Sext. Quintilius and P. Curiatius. Dionysius, Sext. Quintilius and P. Horatius. Diodorus, Sext. Quintilius Tergeminus. The Capitoll stones name him Sext. Quintilius, sonne of Sext. nephew of Pub. For this surname Tergeminus is common both to the Horatij and Curiatij. But Sigonius and Onuphrius allow Horatius rather.

Sext. Quintilius sonne of Sextus, nephew of Pub.

TO this Consull the Greeke records give the surname of Varus, and so the Capitoline tables of stone do represent him. But Diodorus, Dionysius, Livie, and Cassiodorus deliver the same man unto us without the surname. Who was his Colleague, it is doubtfull. For by Dionysius it was P. Horatius; by Livie and Cassiodorus, Pub. Curiatius; by Diodorus, Tergeminus; which is a surname as well of the Curiatij as the Horatij. Onuphrius rather approveth of Curiatius.

Decemvirs Consular.

Livie and Diodorus, together with the Capitoline registers (as farre foorth as may bee gathered by the broken fragments of the tables) shew that App. Claudius and T. Genucius were Coss. elect for this year, but they resigned up the place, in regard of creating Decemvirs. Now as touching this Decemvirat, the law Terentia brought it into the commonweale, which law A. Terentius Arsa, a Tribune of the Commons promulged as touching five Quinquavirs to be created, who should set downe lawes to gage the Coss. authority. For the Commons complained, that their government was too great & intolerable, and therefore required that it might be abated and made more moderate. Which law, after it had been for six yeers together hotely canvassed by the Trib. to no effect, in the end waxed cold againe, by reason that the said Trib. obtained a graunt to double their own number. But afterwards upon occasion that Romilius & Veturius the Coss. bare themselves too extreame in rigor against the Commons refusing warfare, the said law was set on foot againe, again, and the suit followed more hotly than before. Whereupon when the LL. of the Senat were doubtfull what to doe, at length they resolved upon this point, (whereof the principall adviser was T. Romilius) to create certain lawgivers, who should set down the rights and privileges both of nobles and commons. And looke what ordinances by them were decreed, the same should bind both the one state and the other. The Commons agreed to this determination: and so three Embassadors, namely, Sp. Posthumius Albus, Au. Manlius Vullo, and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus, were sent into Greece to learn the statutes, customs, rights, and lawes of the Atheniens and other cities of Greece, and the same to bring with them to Rome. These went their embassy when Atinius and Tarpeius were Consuls, and three yeeres after returned with the said lawes, whiles Sestius and Menenius were Consuls. Now when the Tribunes were instant and called hard upon them, to begin once for to make these positive lawes; and that now already Ap. Claudius and T. Genutius were elected Coss. for this yeere; there passed an act of the Senat, (according to the advise of Ap. Claudius) That all other magistracies should surcease, and so Decemvirs be created in consular, nay in roiall authoritie absolutely, without libertie of appealing from them to the people: who should choose as well out of their owne customes and ordinances, as the foreine lawes above-said, the best and most profitable to the common-weale, and set downe the rights of the people of Rome. And looke what they prescribed and presented, (if the Senate and people of Rome allowed thereof) that should stand in force and bind the whole bodie of the state for ever. When this act was approved by the Commons, the Consuls resigned and gave over. In whose stead, were chosen Decemvirs consular, namely, Ap. Claudius, T. Genutius, (the same that gave up their Consulship;) Sp. Posthumius, Serv. Sulpitius, Au. Manlius, (those that went in embassy from the Coss. to Athens;) T. Romilius, C. Julius, P. Sestius, Pub. Horatius, all men of Consular calling, and such as had been Consuls before. Besides, Sp. Veturius, according to Livie, Diodorus, and Dionysius: although Dionysius calleth Posthumius by the name of Publius and not Spurius, as Livie and Diodorus doe. Likewise Livie fore-nameth Veturius, Lucius; Dionysius Titus; but Diodorus and the Capitoline stones, Spurius. These Decemvirs began their government in the 301 yeere after the foundation of the citie, as Livie writeth; and after him Cassiodorus goeth. But the vouchers of the Capitoll records, say it was the yeere 302; & with them agreeth Solinus. But Varro (whome Onuphrius followeth) accounteth the yeere 303. These sat in judgement and ministred justice to the people by turnes every one his tenth day: on which day the said chiefe justice bare the soveraigne port, with his 12 Lictors before him; the other nine had but one sergeant apeece to give attendance: and the singular concord among themselves, which otherwhiles was an agreement profitable when they were private, proved exceeding great equitie to others.

By this time the Commons, besides that they detested the name of Coss. no lesse than KK. found no misse of the Tribunes assistance, nor sought once after it, seeing the Decemvirs yeeld one unto another in reciprocal appealing. With great affection therefore and endeavour, as well of nobles as commons, there were created for this yeere also Decemvirs in Consuls authoritie absolutely without appeal, Ap. Claudius the second time, Q. Fabius who had been four times Consull, M. Cornelius Maluginensis brother of L. Cornelius, who had been Consull in the yeere 295; Manius Sergius, L. Minutius, T. Antonius Merenda, M. Rabuleius; and three likewise of the Commons, Q. Petilius, K. Duilius, and Sp. Oppius Cornicen, as witnesseth Diodorus, Dionysius, and Livie; although the gentile names for the most part are by Diodorus omitted.

305

When the more part of the former yeere was past, and that upon the adding of two other tables to the former ten, there remained no more to doe, (in case the said tables were once in the high court and assembly of the Centuries passed) why the common-weale should have any need of the Decemvirs, in so much as the commons expected, that soone after, the solemne court and assembly aforesaid for creation of Consuls should be published: then the Decemvirs without any word at all made of that election or assembly, came abroad guarded with whole troupes of young gentlemen Patritians, and demeaned themselves more proudly and insolently to every man. But before the yeere was fully expired, by occasion of the lecherous lust of

T. Quintius Capitolinus IIII. Agrippa Furius.

Dionysius and Livie both, name the Coss. of this yeere, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, & Agrippa Furius. Diodorus and Cassiodorus conceale the surname and the numerall note of foure. The Greeke records have Furius and Capitolinus. Onuphrius unto Furius addeth the surnames of the grandfire, to wit, Medullinus Fufus.

M. Genutius. C. Curtius.

Livie delivereth unto us for Coss. this yeere, M. Genutius, and P. Curvatus. Cassiodorus likewise M. Genutius and P. Curvatus: but Dionysius, M. Genutius and C. Quintius: and Diodorus hath, M. Genutius and Agrippa Curtius Chilo. But as Sigonius, and after him Onuphrius have noted, it is falsely read in Livie, Curvatus for Curtius; and that is proved by the authoritie of Varro de lingua latina: and therefore in the Sicilian registers written they are, Genutius and Curtius.

A. Sempronius Atratinus. } Militarie Tribunes in Consular authoritie: upon whose resignation Consuls were chosen in their rooms.
T. Clodius.
L. Atilius.

L. Papirius Mugilanus. L. Sempronius Atratinus.

When C. Canuleius a Tribune of the Commons, had the former yeere published a second law, That one of the Consuls should be created out of the Commons, (whereby the dignitie of the Patritij was empaired) the nobles fearing least the said lawe would passe in deed maugre their heads, drew to a point; whereof C. Claudius made the first motion & was the adviser, That in stead of Consuls there should be created militarie Tribunes, three of the Patritij, and as many of the Commons; who being endued with Consull authoritie, should governe the common-weale. Also, that when their yeeres government was expired, the advise both of Senat and also of people should be once again required, Whether they would have Consuls rather than Tribunes consular? and looke which pleased them, they should be created. These points being resolved upon & decreed, three militarie Tribunes were created onely, of Ap. Claudius, who chalenged a maiden (one of the commons daughters) as a bondservant, according as Livie more at large writeth; and also of the commons insurrection and departing into the Aventine, the foresaid Decemvirs gave over their magistracie: and when Q. Furius the high Pontifex called a generall assembly of the tribes, ten Tribunes of the Commons were againe chosen: and so at length in another assembly of Centuries for the Consuls, holden by the Interregent, created there were Consuls,

L. Valerius Potitus. M. Horatius Barbatus.

These Consuls Onuphrius casteth upon a third yeere of the Decemvirs (although Livie seemeth to dissent) to the end that hee might jumpe with the account of the Capitoll, which he supposeth to be collected by Varro: for by their calculation, the triumphs of these Consuls declared in the Capitoll records, are engraven upon this verie yeere, i. 304: so as it appeareth evidently, that part of this yeere was taken up by the Decemvirs, and part by the Consuls. Tacitus and Rufus write, that the Decemvirs continued but two yeeres.

306

Livie putteth down for Consuls, Sp. Herminius and T. Virginus Calimontanus. Cassiodorus saith, L. Herminius and T. Virginus. Dionysius writeth λαβρον ἐρυθρίων, τίτον ἀργυρίων: and Diodorus thus, λαβρινον ἐρυθρίων, τίτον ἀργυρίων σπύκτον: the Greeke records, Herminius, Tricothus: whereby Onuphrius seareth that it be corruptly written in Diodorus, Syruclius for Tricothus: for Syruclius was a surname of the Servilij and not of the Virginij. As for his colleague Herminius, that he is to be fore named Lars, besides Diodorus & Dionysius, Valerius also sheweth in his tenth booke, where he writeth thus: The fore-name of Lars is derived from the Lars.

M. Geganius Macerinus. C. Iulius.

These are recorded likewise to be the Consuls this yeere. The surname Macerinus is suppressed by Cassiodorus and Diodorus, who also nameth the other L. Iulius. In Dionysius certaine pages be wanting in this place. Cyprian his Kalender hath for Macerinus, Macerinus.

all Patritij: and well ynough were the Commons content therewith, because themselves were eligible & capable of that dignitie. Howbeit, this regiment of theirs newly set up, stood not firmly established. For within 3 moneths after, by a decree of the Augurs, they resigned up their honourable place, as if there had been some error committed, in their election: and then T. Quintius Barbutus (nominated Interregent) created Consuls, L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus. These Consuls are left out in the Sicilian registers. Well saith Livie therefore, that these Consuls are found neither in auncient annales and yearly records, nor yet in the kalender of the magistrates. But Cicero maketh mention of them in his epistle to Papyrius Pætus.

M. Geganus Macerinus II. T. Quintius Capitolinus V.

Dionysius and Cassiodorus avouch these for Consuls this yeere. As for Dionysius, he saith that they entred in the moneth of December. Cassius concealeth both their surnames, and Diodorus the one, namely Capitolinus. The Greeke records have Macerinus the second time, and Capitolinus the fifth time. Zonaras nameth them Macerinus & Barbutus.

M. Fabius Vibulanus. Postumius Ebutius Cornicen.

Livie saith, that Consuls of this yeere, were so named. Diodorus and Cassiodorus are silent in their surnames. The Greeke records have Vibulanus and Helus. Diodorus attributeth to Ebutius the surname of ἑλκεος, but what manner of addition that might bee, Sigonius knoweth not, & thinketh that it should be read, ἑλκεος.

C. Furius Pacilus. M. Papyrius Crassus.

These Consuls by Livie and Cassiodorus are in this wise represented unto us. But by Diodorus after this sort, Q. Furius Fusus, and Manius Papyrius Crassus. And by the Greeke records thus, Pacilus and Crassus.

Livius and Cassiodorus, deliver these Consuls thus fully named, Proculus Geganus

Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus. Diodorus, T. Menenius, and Proculus Geganus Macerinus. The Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Lanatus.

T. Quintius Capitolinus VI. Agrippa Menenius Lanatus.

By Livie and Cassiodorus, these were the Consuls for this yeere: but after Diodorus, T. Quintius, and T. Menenius. According to the Sicilian rolls, Menenius and Capitolinus.

316

Mam. Aemylus. L. Quintius son of Cincinnatus. } Militarie Tribunes in Consuls authoritie.
L. Iulius.

The Tribunes of the Commons imported and prevailed, that there should be an election holden for Tribunes militarie, rather than Consuls; making no doubt, but in the chusing of fixe (for so many now by law might be created) some of the commoners by making profession that they would be revenged for the death of Melius, would step into the place: howbeit the Commons created no more than three Tribunes with Consular authoritie, and among them L. Quintius, the son of Cincinnatus. In which election, Mamercus Aemylus, a right honourable man and of great worth, was by their suffrages preferred before Quintius, and Iulius they made the third. In like manner, Diodorus nameth three Tribunes militarie for this yeere; but in this sort, Manius Aemylus Mamercus, C. Iulius, and L. Quintius.

M. Geganus Macerinus III. L. Sergius Fidenas.

When the Commons, together with their Tribunes were quiet, and carefully regarded the maine state of the Commonweale, no question there was nor controversie, but that Consuls were chosen, to wit, M. Geganus Macerinus the third time, & L. Sergius, so saith Livie. Cassiodorus doth the same, but that he setteth down the names of the Consuls, onely in this wise, M. Geganus the third time, & L. Sergius, without surnames. Diodorus likewise, M. Geganus & L. Sergius. Cuspinians kalender, and the Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Fidenas. For this Sergius was surnamed Fidenas (as Livie reporteth) by occasion of the warre which hee made against the Fidenates.

M. Cor-

M. Cornelius Maluginensis. L. Papyrius Crassus.

Livie and Cassiodorus report these above-named, for this yeere Consuls. Diodorus nameth them, L. Papyrius and M. Cornelius Macerinus: but doubtlesse not without error, as Sigonius supposeth: for both in Cuspinians Kalender and the rolls of Sicilie, we find Maluginensis and Crassus.

C. Iulius II. L. Virginius.

These Consuls are found for this yeere in Livie and Cassiodorus; but in Diodorus, C. Iulius and Proculus Virginius Tricostrus. In Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Iulius and Virginius.

320

C. Iulius III. } M. Manlius.
L. Virginius II. } Q. Sulpitius.

I find in Licinius Macer, that the same Consuls were chosen againe for the yeere following, to wit, Iulius the third time, and Virginius the second. Valerius Antias and Quin. Tuberо alledge for this yeeres Consuls, M. Manlius and Q. Sulpitius. But in these so different records of theirs, Tuberо and Macer both, professe to goe by the linnen bookes; and neither of them dissembleth but that the ancient writers report of militarie Tribunes that yeere created. As for Licinius, he doubteth not to follow those linnen records, and Tuberо cannot resolve of the truth. But among other things, which by continuance of time are unknowne, this also is left uncerteine. Thus much Livie. But Diodorus in stead of Consuls, setteth downe three militarie Tribunes, namely, M. Manlius, Q. Sulpitius Prætextatus, and Servius Cornelius Cossus. The Greeke records (following Antias and Tuberо) have delivered to us Consuls, Capitolinus and Mamercinus.

321

M. Fabius Vibulanus. } Tribunes militarie in
L. Sergius Fidenas. } Cons. authoritie.
Marcus Esilius.

The Tribunes of the Commons in their orations, continually forbad the election of Consuls: and when they had brought it so about, that the government was at the point of interregencie, they wan the masterie in the end, that militarie Tribunes might be chosen with Consular authoritie. But reward of this their victorie which they shott at, namely to have a commoner created, they obtained none: for all were elected out of the Patritij, namely, M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Fostius, L. Sergius Fidenas. Thus much Livie. Diodorus likewise nameth three, but corruptly, to wit, M. Fabius, M. Fostius, and L. Servilius. As for Fostius in some of the Capitoll monuments, hee is written Flaccinator and not Fostius, as in the common editions of Livie, whom Diodorus calleth Fostius.

L. Pinarius Mamercus. } Tribunes militarie in
L. Furius Medullinus. } Cons. authoritie.
Sp. Postumius Albus.

No motion was made of Consuls election. So, Tribunes militarie were created in Consuls authoritie these, L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Spurius Postumius Albus; as Livie writeth. In Diodorus they are named thus, L. Furius, Sp., Pinarius Mamercus.

323

T. Quintius [sonne of Lucius.] Cincinnatus Pennus.
C. Iulius Mento.

An act of the Senate passed, that an election of Consuls should be holden, wherein T. Quintius, [sonne of Lucius] Cincinnatus, surnamed also Pennus, and C. Iulius Mento, were made Consuls, saith Livie. The same Consuls Cassiodorus also avoucheth. The Greeke records have Pennus and Mento: but Diodorus nameth them barely, T. Quintius and Caius Iulius.

L. Papyrius Crassus. L. Iulius.

The Tribunes of the Commons made much ado, and kept a canvassing in the citie, that Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie should be created, but could not prevail. So Consuls were chosen, L. Papyrius Crassus and L. Iulius. So say Livie and Cassiodorus: but Diodorus nameth them falsely, Caius Papyrius and L. Iunius: the Greeke records, Crassus and Iulius.

L. Sergius Fidenas. II. Hostus Lucretius Tricipitinus.

THe Consuls this yeere in Cassiodorus, are L. Sergius & Hostus Lucretius in Diodorus, Opiter Lucretius and L. Sergius Fidenas; in Livie L. Sergius Fidenas the second time, and Hostus Lucretius Tricipitinus. In the Sicilian registers, Tricipitinus and Fidenas. Of these, Valerius maketh mention in his Epitome.

A. Cornelius Cossus. T. Quintius Pennus. II.

Hese Consuls are named by Livie and Cassiodorus for this yeere. But Diodorus avoucheth L. Quintius & Sæpronius; but corruptly, as Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose. For in the Sicilian records are written, Cossus and Pennus, the surnames of Cornelius and Quintius. Of these Consuls Livie spake before, in the yeere 316.

C. Servilius Ahala. L. Papirius Mugillanus.

Livie and Cassiodorus, name Consuls for this yeere, C. Servilius Ahala, and L. Papirius Mugillanus. Diodorus for Ahala, putteth downe Struclius: for well it may be, that Struclius was also called Ahala.

328

T. Quintius Pennus.
M. Posthumus.
C. Furius.

Military Tribunes in Coss. authoritie.

A. Cornelius Cossus.

The commons caried it cleere, that no Consuls this yeere were created: so, foure there were elected militarie Tribunes in Consuls authority, namely, T. Quintius Pennus immediately upon his Consulship, M. Posthumus, C. Furius, and A. Cornelius Cossus. Thus writeth Livie: and the same, Diodorus nameth.

329

A. Sempronius Atratinus.
L. Quintius Cincinnatus.
L. Furius Medullinus.
L. Horatius Barbatus.

Tribb. militarie in
Coss. authoritie.

These abovenamed (as Livie reporteth) were Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie this yeere. Diodorus leaveth out all their surnames, and L. Horatius full and whole.

330

Ap. Claud. the Decemvirs son.
Sp. Nautius Rutilus.
L. Sergius Fidenas.
Sex. Julius Iulus.

Tribb. militarie in Consuls authoritie.

These Tribunes militarie in Coss. authority, Livie stretcheth downe for this yeere. The same doth Diodorus also nominate, all but their surnames, and Ap. Claudius whom hee calleth Titus. Livie moreover saith, that there were two, Spurius Nautius Rutilus, Tribunes in those daies; (but no doubt, as Onuphrius thinketh, there is some error in the copies of the booke) the one who is now the first time, & a second time shall bee in the yeere 338; the other, who was first in the yeere 335, and once againe in the yeere 350. The Capitoll monuments of stone have the same: but they shew that the one was but once, and the other thrice Tribune.

C. Sempronius Atratinus. Q. Fabius Vibulanus.

The Consuls this yeere created were according to Livius & Cassiodorus, C. Sempronius Atratinus & Q. Fabius Vibulanus [Diodorus overpasseth them] whom Livie reporteth to have entered into government, upon the Ides of December. Of C. Sempronius Atratinus Consull, Valerius writeth, 6 booke, cap. 5, whom hee forenameth Lucius; but in the third booke and second chapter, hee speaketh of both, although untrue; for Q. Fabius, hee nameth Q. Catulus.

L. Manlius Capitolinus.
Q. Antonius Merenda.
L. Papirius Mugillanus.
L. Servilius Struclius.

Tribunes militarie
in Consuls authoritie.

The Senate being offended with the very name of Consuls, for the hatred they bare to Sempronius, commaunded Tribunes militarie to be created with Consuls authority. And these they were, L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, and L. Papirius Mugillanus. Thus much Livie, in whose storie the name is missing of the fourth, to wit, L. Servilius Struclius, who in the yeere three hundred thirtie seven, is found engraven in the Capitoll stones, Tribunes militarie the second time. Of these, Diodorus saith not a word. In a fragment of the Capitoline marble, there is to be scene the surnames of Mugillanus, belonging to L. Papirius.

T. Quintus

T. Quintus Capitolinus. N. Fabius Vibulanus.

Not only Livie, but Cassiodorus also recordeth, that the Coss. this yeere were N. Fabius Vibulanus and T. Quintus Capitolinus. Diodorus overpasseth them; but so doe not the Sicilian registers. In a fragment of the Capitoll marbles, we find engraven T. Quintus Capitolinus Barbatus, and N. Fabius. This Fabius was the sonne of Q. Fabius the Decemvir, who after the three hundred Fabius slaine at Cremera, survived, and was the first of all that kindred and familie forenamed Numerius: as Valerius Maximus in his 10 booke, and Sex. Pompeius doe report. As for T. Quintus, sonne hee was (as Livie writeth) to that Capitolinus who was Consull six times.

An Interregencie.

When the greater part of the yeere was spent in troubles and contentions, between the new Tribunes of the Commons and certaine Interregents, whiles the Tribunes one while would, not suffer the Patritij to goe together about the declaring of an Interregent, and another while impeached the Interregent that hee could not passe an act of the Senat for the election of Consuls; at length L. Papirius Mugillanus the Interregent, by rebuking as wel the Senatours as the Tribunes of the Commons, prevailed, that an assembly should be holden for chusing of Tribunes consular. So there were created Tribunes militarie with Consuls authority, and all Patritij, T. Quintus Cincinnatus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus, M. Manlius, L. Sempronius Atratinus. Thus much Livie.

Agrippa Menenius Lanatus.
P. Lucretius Tricipitinus.

C. Servilius.

Tribunes militarie in Coss. authoritie.

Militarie Tribunes with Consuls authority for this yeere, are set downe by Livie, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and Sp. Nautius: for the name of the fourth is wanting; and that was C. Servilius, sonne of Quintus and nephew of Caius, surnamed Axilla; who the yeere following, in the Capitoll tables is numbred among the Tribunes consular, with the numerall note of II. So as it must needs be, that he was the first time in this yeere, for as much as there is no other fit void place left for him. Diodorus nameth Sp. Peturius.

L. Sergius Fidenas.
M. Papirius Mugillanus.
C. Servilius the son of Priscus.

Tribb. militarie in
Coss. authoritie.

For Tribunes Consular this yeere, Livie nameth these. This C. Servilius, is by Verrius Flaccus cleped Axilla. Diodorus calleth them, L. Sergius, M. Servilius, and M. Papirius. Now this M. Papirius was sonne to L. Papirius Mugillanus the first Censor.

337

Agrippa Menenius Lanatus.
P. Lucretius Tricipitinus.
L. Servilius Struclius.
Sp. Peturius Crassus.

All these are recorded by Livie for Tribunes militarie this yeere. Of these, L. Servilius Struclius was the first time in the 332 yeere, but left out in Livie through fault of those that wrote the copies. Diodorus hath the same Tribunes besides their surnames, and L. Servilius, whom hee calleth Caius. In a Capitoline table their names are thus cut, P. Lucretius sonne of Hostus, Agrippa Menenius sonne of T. nephew of Agrippa.

338

A. Sempronius Atratinus III.
Sp. Nautius Rutilus II.
M. Papirius Mugillanus II.

Onely these are by Livie recorded: but, that the pen men who wate out the bookes, left out the fourth Tribune of this yeere, (Quintus Fabius son of Quintus and nephew of Marcus, surnamed also Vibulanus) the Capitoll stones and Diodorus doe testifie. Livie himselfe also doth shew the same, who writeth, that Quintus Fabius was Tribune militarie the second time, in the yeere three hundred and fortie: but in what yeere hee was first, it appeareth not. Moreover, A. Sempronius is by Verrius Flaccus named, the sonne of Lucius and nephew of Aulus. Diodorus reckoneth all foure, but hee concealeth their surnames.

P. Cornelius Cossus. Q. Cincinnatus.
C. Valerius Potitus. N. Fabius Vibulanus.

THese doth Livie deliver unto us for Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie. Diodorus in this wise, P. Cornelius, Caius . . . Fabius. The table of the Capitoll thus, P. Cornelius . . . F. nephew of P. C. Valerius, sonne of L. nephew of Volusus. The forename of Quintius is unknowne.

Cn. Cornelius Cossus. L. Valerius Potitus.
Q. Fabius Vibulanus II. L. Posthumius Regillensis.

THese declareth Livius for this yeere: but Diodorus, Titus Posthumius, Caius Cornelius, C. Valerius, and C. Fabius. But Verrius Flaccus nameth P. Posthumius, sonne of A. nephew also of Aulus; whome Livie writeth to have been stoned to death by his owne armie for his crueltie.

Cn. Cornelius Cossus. C. Furius Medullinus.

Then the Nobles and LL. of the Senate imported, that there should be Consuls created in a Centuriate assembly, which Q. Fabius held. And the Consuls were M. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus. The same are named by Diodorus and Cassiodorus, but that they leave out their surnames. The Greeke records have Cossus and Meaulinus.

342

Q. Fabius Ambustus. C. Furius Pacilus.

Livie and Cassiodorus name these for Consuls: Diodorus suppresseth their surnames.

M. Papyrius. C. Nautius Rutilus.

Both Livie and Cassiodorus report for this yeere Consuls, M. Papyrius and C. Nautius Rutilus. Diodorus hath not a word of their surnames. Cuspinians booke setteth them downe by their surnames only Mugillinus & Rutilus.

M. Aemilius. C. Valerius.

Livie and Cassiodorus call these Consuls, M. Aemilius and C. Valerius. Diodorus in stead of M. hath M. i. Manius. This Aemilius in the table of the Capitoll, is named in his first and third Tribuneship, M. Aemilius sonne of Manius, nephew of M. and surnamed Mamerminus.

Cn. Cornelius Cossus. L. Furius Medullinus II.

Livie putteth these downe for the Consuls of this yeere. Cassiodorus passeth over their surnames, and the numerall note of two. Diodorus hath Lu. Furius and Cn. Pompeius: but he is to be written Cn. Cornelius, out of the end of a broken fragment in the Capitoll: and the other L. Furius, by his Tribuneships testified in the Capitoll records.

346

C. Julius Iulus. } Tribunes militarie in
P. Cornelius Cossus. } Cons. authoritie.
C. Servilius Ahala.

THese are set downe for Tribunes militarie this yeere by T. Livius. Diodorus saith nothing of their surnames, which the Capitoline tables exhibit unto us. C. Servilius is written in his second Tribuneship (after the Capitoll records) the sonne of Pub. and nephew of Q. surnamed Ahala.

347

L. Furius Medullinus II. C. Valerius Potitus II.
N. Fabius Vibulanus II. C. Servilius Ahala II.

Livie reporteth, that the four Tribunes consular were all Patritij this yeere, and had born that dignitie once before, to wit, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, N. Fabius Vibulanus, and C. Servilius Ahala; and that this man last named was chosen againe and continued in his place still this yeere with the former, as well in regard of other vertues as for the fresh favour and late grace gotten by his singular moderation and rare carriage in his government. Diodorus hath C. Furius, C. Servilius, C. Valerius, and N. Fabius. In the Capitoline tables, two are written short, Potitus Volusus II. and Medullinus; the other two at full: whereby it doth appeare, (as Onuphrius reporteth) that Livie was deceived. For Medullinus was not this yeere Tribune the second time, but the first: who had been twice Consul before, and after this yeere, will be no lesse than seven times Tribune militarie.

P. Corne-

P. Cornelius Cossus. N. Fabius Ambustus.
Cn. Cornelius Cossus. L. Valerius Potitus.

OF these foure Tribunes militarie, L. Valerius Potitus, and N. Fabius Ambustus stand upon record in the Capitoll tables; the other two, as appeareth by a fragment thereof, by Livie also and Cassiodorus, were Pub. Cornelius, sonne of Aulus, nephew of M. Rutilus Cossus, so written by his Dictatorship. Diodorus reckoneth Terentius Maximus for the fourth Tribune.

349

T. Quintius Capitolinus. A. Manlius.
Q. Quintius Cincinnatus. L. Furius Medullinus. III.
C. Julius Iulus. II. M. Aemilius Mamerinus.

Diodorus saith, that this yeere sixe Tribunes were created, but hee nameth but three, T. Quintius Capitolinus, C. Julius, and A. Manlius. Livie rehearseth them all as here they be set down. The Capitoline stone hath Iulus. II. Capitolinus Barbatus, Cincinnatus, & the other three. And this was the first yeere that had sixe Tribunes militarie, notwithstanding that the law permitted it before, at what time as first it was graunted, that Tribunes should be created: and in this yeere began the siege first before Veij.

C. Valerius Potitus. III. Cn. Cornelius Cossus.
M. Sergius Fidenas. K. Fabius Ambustus.
P. Cornelius Maluginensis. Sp. Nautius Rutilus. II.

The same Tribunes that Livie nameth, Diodorus also rehearseth, but that hee leaveth out the surnames, and corruptly calleth Cn. Cornelius by the name of Iunius Lucullus. In the Capitoline stones they are written, Maluginensis, Cossus. II. Ambustus: and the other three fully out. Nautius Rutilus Livie nameth the second time, but Verrius Flaccus the third time.

M. Aemilius Mamerinus. II. M. Quintius Vetus.
L. Valerius Potitus. III. L. Iulus Iulus.
App. Claudius Crassus. M. Posthumius.
M. Furius Camillus. M. Posthumius Albinus.

Livie writeth, that the number of Tribunes militarie were by the Romanes augmented, & eight of them created, which were more than ever any time before, whose names we have set downe. In Diodorus they are thus named, Manius Claudius, Mar. Quintilius, Lu. Julius, M. Furius, L. Valerius. And albeit there be wanting in him some Tribunes, yet Onuphrius thinketh, and so doth Sigonius, that himselfe by his owne writing delivered not eight, but sixe: which Verrius Flaccus also observed in the Capitoline tables.

C. Servilius Ahala. III. Q. Sulpitius.
Q. Servilius. A. Manlius. II.
L. Virginius. M. Sergius. II.

IN Livie the Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie, are C. Servilius Ahala the third time, Quim. Servilius, and Lu. Virginius: the rest, as in the tables of the Capitoll, but onely the forenames. Livie nameth Qu. Servilius, Fidenas in the other sixe Tribuneships following, which hee shall beare. To L. Cn. Virginius, Onuphrius addeth Tricostrus, a surname usuall in that house. Diodorus squarseth not out of this ranage, but as Sigonius noteth, hee dooth fault in the name, κλαύδιος μαρκος ἄγκος. In a fragment of the Capitoll, they are thus named, Qu. Sulpitius the sonne of Servilius. N. Camerinus Cornutus, A. Manlius, sonne of Aulus, nephew of C. Vulso Capitolinus the second time, M. Sergius sonne of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, surnamed Fidenas, the second time.

353

L. Valerius Potitus. IV. Cn. Cornelius Cossus.
M. Furius Camillus. K. Fabius Ambustus.
M. Aemilius Mamerinus. III. L. Iulus Iulus.

Livie reckoneth all these Tribunes this yeere. Diodorus putteth downe Lu. Iulus, M. Furius, Aemilius Mamerinus, Caius Cornelius, C. Fabius, παύλος σέβτιος, but amisse. In the fragment of the Capitoll, they are thus named, Lucius Iulus, sonne of Lucius, nephew of Postumus, surnamed Iulus. Marcus Aemilius, sonne of Manius, nephew of Mar. Mamerinus. K. Fabius sonne of Marcus, nephew of Qu. Ambustus the second time. These were commaunded to enter into government upon the first day of October (whereas the thirteenth of December was the usuall day beforetime) by reason son of an overthrow received the former yeere at Veij by M. Sergius, Camillus made an expedition in the Faliscians countrie, Cornelius to the Capenates, Valerius to the Volscians for the recoverie of Anxur, Emilius and Fabius to besiege Veij.

P. Licinius Calvus. P. Manlius.
T. Titinius. P. Malin.
L. Furius Medullinus. L. Publius Vulsus.

THese by T. Livius are this yeere named the Tribunes militarie. But Diodorus rehearseth onely three, namely P. Melius, Sp. Menius, and L. Furius. But Onuphrius thinketh that he is to be read, not L. Furius but Sp. Furius. The same author hath put so P. Licinius the surname of Calvus, whom Livie writeth to have bene the first man of the commonaltie chosen Tribune militarie, onely to take possession of the said right and interest.

355

M. Veturius. M. Pomponius.
C. Duilius. Volero Pubilius.
Cn. Genutius. L. Atilius.

Hese Diodorus sheweth for Tribunes. But Livie setteth downe Marcus Veturius to have bene the onely Patriitian, and the rest commoners, namely M. Pomponius, C. Duilius, Volero Pubilius, Cn. Genutius, L. Atilius. Cuspinian his booke, who every yeere delivereth the names onely of two Tribunes, hath Augurius and Longus, surnames of Genutius and Atilius.

356

L. Valerius Potitus. L. Furius Medullinus.
M. Valerius Max. Q. Servilius Fidenus.
M. Furius Camillus. Q. Sulpitius Camerinus.

ALl these Tribunes militarie for this yeere created, were Patriitij, as Livie writeth: neither differeth Diodorus, although he recite two names corruptly, to wit, κλαυδίου & γαν, ιγ μάρος & παιος, Plutarch in the life of Camillus maketh mention of the said Camillus, the second time Tribune militarie; and the Capitoline stone, of Medullinus the third time.

L. Julius Iulus. A. Posthumius Regillensis.
L. Furius Medullinus. P. Cornelius Maluginensis.
L. Sergius Eidenas. A. Manlius.

IN this wise Livie reckoneth them: but Diodorus L. Sergius, A. Posthumius, P. Cornelius & Ερον, κενσον, Q. Manlius & αγχιον, καμλον. But in those two Greek written names, as Sigonius and Onuphrius observed, there is a foule error.

358

P. Licinius. P. F. Calvus. L. Titinius. II.
P. Menius. I. P. Malin. II.
Cn. Genutius. II. L. Atilius. II.

IN this manner are these Tribunes militarie delivered unto us by Livie. But Diodorus nameth them thus, L. Titinius, P. Licinius, P. Malin, Q. Menius, Cn. Genutius, and L. Atilius. All these, but L. Licinius the sonne of Publius, (as Livie saith) bare the dignitie of Tribuneship a litle before: who writeth moreover, that Genutius was slaine in a battaile against the Faliscines.

P. Cornelius Cossus. P. Cornelius Scipio.
Q. Fabius Ambustus. III. L. Furius Medullinus. V.
M. Valerius Max. II. Q. Servilius. III.

After the winning of Veij, this yeere had for Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie, those above-named. Diodorus calleth P. and Ser. Cornelius both, Cossi in the rest, saving that hee concealeth their surnames, hee agreeth.

L. Furius Medullinus. VI. Sp. Posthumius.
C. Emilius. P. Cornelius. I. I.
L. Valerius Poplicola. M. Furius Camillus.

Livie nameth these in this yeere. Diodorus, M. Furius Aemilius, & κατταλον βαρον, but corruptly. Camillus now is the third time. Sigonius and Onuphrius thinke, that by P. Cornelius we must understand Scipio, and not Cossus. This yeere Camillus Tribune militarie, by his just dealing reduced the Faliscians to the obedience of the people of Rome; in that hee sent backe unto them, that schoollmaster who betrayed their children: as Livie & Plutarch write.

Vale-

Valerius (not without some suspicion of error) writeth in his sixt booke, that Camillus did this being Consul: whereas Plutarch saith, hee was never Consul.

L. Lucretius Flavius. Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus.

After fifteene yeeres (saith Livie) Coss. were created againe, L. Lucretius Flavius, and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus. Diodorus and Cassiodorus passe over the surnames. The Sicilian registers doe shew, Flavius and Camerinus.

L. Valerius Potitus. M. Manlius Capitolinus.

Lucius Valerius Potitus, and M. Manlius surnamed afterwards Capitolinus, are by Livie reported Consuls this yeere. Dionysius in his first booke maketh mention of these Consuls, naming them, L. Valerius Potitus, and T. Manlius Capitolinus. Cassiodorus delivereth them by the names of L. Valerius and M. Manlius. Diodorus, of L. Valerius and A. Manlius: but the Sicilian registers, of Potitus and Capitolinus.

L. Lucretius. L. Furius Medullinus. VII.
Serv. Sulpitius. Agrippa Furius.
M. Emilius. C. Emilius. I.

By occasion that the Coss. lay sick, thought good it was, to renew the government by means of an Interregencie: therefore after they had deposed the Consuls by an act of the Senat, six Tribunes militarie were created with Consular authoritie, by the Interregent: who upon the first day of Iulie began their magistracie, as Livie saith. Diodorus mentioneth but foure, namely, L. Lucretius, Serv. Sulpitius, C. Aemilius, and Lu. Furius. As for Sulpitius, Zonaras calleth him Rufus; which surname Onuphrius also hath put unto him.

364

Q. Fabius Ambustus. Q. Sulpitius Longus.
The ij breethren of Q. Q. Servilius. IIII.
Fabius Ambustus. Servil. Cor. Maluginensis.

THese are by T. Livius recorded for Tribb. militarie in Consuls authoritie: but Diodorus reckoneth the three Fabij, Q. K. and C. and the other three, besides Plutarch in Camillus, Gellius out of Verrius Flaccus, in his 5 booke and 17 chapter; Macrobius also in his first booke of Saturnals, make report of Quin-

tus Sulpitius, a Tribune militarie.

L. Valerius Poplicola. II. A. Manlius.
L. Virginus. L. Emilius.
P. Cornelius. L. Posthumius.

According to Livie, these were created Tribunes militarie after the winning of the citie: but by Diodorus, they were Pub. Cornelius, L. Virginus, Valerius, A. Manlius, and L. Posthumius. Of these Tribunes, Macrobius speaketh in his first booke of Saturnalia.

T. Quintius Cincinnatus. L. Aquilius Corvus.
Q. Servilius Fidenas. V. L. Lucretius Tricipitinus.
L. Julius Iulus. Serv. Sulpitius Rufus.

L. Papirius. C. Sergius.
L. Emilius. II. C. Cornelius.
L. Menenius. L. Valerius Poplicola. I. II.

THese, Livie reporteth for Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie this yeere. But Diodorus hath L. Papirius, C. Cornelius, L. Menenius, C. Servilius, A. Valerius, and Q. Fabius. Howbeit there is wanting in Livie the name of the sixt Tribune, whom (out of Diodorus) Sigonius and Onuphrius have set to the rest, by the name of C. Cornelius. Diodorus also for Sergius hath Servilius, and Aemilius for Fabius.

368

M. Furius Camillus. L. Horatius Pulvillus.
Q. Servilius Fidenas. V. I. P. Valerius.

THe common-weale came to be governed againe by Camillus, a Tribune militarie in Consuls authoritie, and for colleagues were added unto him these 5 here named. But Diodorus saith there were 4 created, M. Cornelius, Q. Servilius, M. Furius, and L. Quintius. In this yeere, when the Dictatorship was offered unto Camillus, hee said there was no need thereof: and he, together with the Tribb. his colleagues, vanquished the Volscians, Antiores, and Tufcanes which rebelled.

A. Manlius. P. Cornelius.
L. Quintus Capitolinus. L. Papirius Crasor II.
T. Quintus Capitolinus. C. Sergius II.

These hath Livie: but Diodorus saith that foure onely were created, namely, L. Papirius, Q. T. and L. all Quintij. But of those six, A. Manlius having been Tribune militarie in the yeere 365, and who shall be a third time in the yeere 371, must now verily be the second time.

370

Ser. Corn. Maluginensis IV. P. Valerius Potitus II.
M. Furius Camillus V. Ser. Sulpitius Rustus II.
C. Papirius Crassus. T. Quintus Cincinnatus II.

These Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie, in this manner be delivered unto us by Livie: but Diodorus (as his manner is) putteth down four; Ser. Sulpitius, L. Papirius, Mar. Cornelius, and T. Quintus. In this yeere, M. Manlius attained and condemned for aspiring to be K. was throwne downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeia: Liv. Plutar. and Valer.

L. Valerius IV. L. Lucretius.
A. Manlius III. L. Aemilius.
Ser. Sulpitius III. M. Tribonius.

Livie raungeth these in this yeere. Diodorus nameth four; L. Valerius Crispus, (which is the name of Tribonius) An. Manlius, and Ser. Sulpitius Crispus, some call Flavius.

372

Sp. Papirius. Q. Servilius.
L. Papirius. C. Sulpitius.

Acording to Livie, these were created Tribunes military in Consuls authoritie. The surname of Cornelius (as we saw before) was Maluginensis. Diodorus writeth four; Q. Servilius, Sp. Papirius, Cornelius, & Flavius, but not truly.

A. Posthumius Regillensis. L. Lucretius.
L. Posthumius Regillensis. M. Fabius Ambustus.

Livie nameth these as we have placed them: but Diodorus in this wise; M. and L. both Furij, A. Posthumius, L. Lucretius, M. Fabius, and L. Posthumius. Plutarch also nameth Camillus Tribune militarie this yeer; wherein he vanquished the Preneestines, the Volscians, and the Tusculans also, against whom war was proclaimed, because they had served in the field under the Preneestines.

L. Valerius V. L. Menenius II.
L. Valerius III. P. Papirius.
C. Sergius III. Ser. Cornel. Maluginensis.

These fixe are set downe by Livie: but Diodorus reckoneth eight, namely, L. and P. both Valerij, C. Terentius, L. Menenius, C. Sulpitius, T. Papirius, L. Aemilius, M. Fabius.

P. Manlius. C. Sextilius.
C. Manlius. M. Albinus.
L. Julius. L. Antistius.

After this, was the generall assembly holden for the election of militarie Tribunes in Consuls authoritie, wherein were as many created of the Commoners as of the Patritij; namely, P. and C. both Manlij, with L. Julius, Patritians: and out of the Commons, C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. But Diodorus exhibireth eight, and to these above rehearsed, he addeth C. Herennius, and P. Trebonius. Sextilius also he calleth Sextius.

376

Sp. Furius. P. Cladius.
Q. Servilius II. M. Horatius.
C. Licinius. L. Geganius.

Livie reporteth these for Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie this yeere: but in Livie, for Lu. Menenius the third time, you must read C. Licinius, as Sigonius hath shewed in his Scholia upon Livie: which Onuphrius also in his Kalender approoveth. But Diodorus speaketh of no more than foure; Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, L. Furius, P. Cladius.

L. Aemilius. Ser. Sulpitius.
P. Valerius IV. L. Quintus Cincinnatus.
C. Veturius. C. Quintus Cincinnatus.

These Tribunes militarie, the Consuls (being forced by the might and strong hand of the great men of the citie) chose all Patritians, as Livie witnesseth. The same also are named by Diodorus, excepting only C. Quintus, who is called by him C. Cornelius. As for Ser. Sulpitius, hee was surnamed Prætextatus. Zonaras nameth him Rufus.

L. Sextius. mons five yeeres.

In this yeere happened the fourth chaunge of the Roman government: for the administration of the weale publicke, fell from Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie, to the Tribunes of the Commons. The authors that procured this mutation, were (as Livie reporteth) C. Licinius Stolo and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the Commons, who in the former yeere having promulged three lawes in favour of the Commons and against the power of the Patritij, the first for redressing of debts; a second for a stent of lands and possessions; & the third, that there should bee no more elections of Tribunes militarie, & that one of the Coss. should necessarily be chosen a commoner: seeing they could not goe through with these laws, by reason of their owne fellowes oppositions (whome of purpose the nobles had made for themselves) fell into an anger, and would suffer no curule magistrates of state to be created, nor any election to be holden, but onely of Aediles & Tribunes, both of Commons. This desolate estate and want of magistrates (whiles the Commons made the same Tribunes still, who with uncessant and invincible peristance never gave over to crosse the election of Tribunes militarie) continued in the citie for the space of five yeeres, as Livie saith. This want of magistrates Diodorus calleth anæxia, and casteth it upon the formeryeere. But Sext. Rufus, Eutropius, Cassiodorus, and Zonaras write, that they ruled the state not five yeeres, but foure onely. Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Kalender; follow Livie, and his Annales it seemeth that the Capitoline writers go by. Plinie also in the sixteen booke and foure and fortieth chapter, maketh mention of the yeere three hundred seventie nine from the foundation of the citie, in which yeere he saith that at Rome

Vhen C. Licinius and L. Sextius the Tribunes gave over their opposition and the libertie of their negative voice, whereby the Interregent called & held an assembly for the election of magistrates, the abovenamed Tribunes militarie, were (as Livie saith) created for this yeere. Diodorus nameth them thus, L. Papirius, L. Menenius, Ser. Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius, who writeth also, that after them there was another Anarchie, & when that was overpast and gone, then were created A. Manlius, L. Furius, Ser. Sulpitius, and Ser. Cornelius. But in his storie, as well through his owne default, as the negligence of the writers that copied out the same, there is a confusion of yeerely magistrates.

A. Cornelius. M. Fabius.

This yeere also, as Livie writeth, had these for Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie. But Diodorus hath Q. Servilius, C. Veturius, A. Cornelius, M. Cornelius, and Mar. Fabius: as for Quintus, Sigonius calleth him rather Cincinnatus than Capitolinus. The rest have their warrant out of the Capitoline fragments, wherein it is thus found Cossus Maluginensis Cincinnatus Mar. Fabius Ambustus. This is that M. Fabius Ambustus, who had bestowed his two daughters in marriage, the one to C. Licinius Stolo, the other to Ser. Sulpitius Prætextatus, as Livie writeth.

L. Quintus. Ser. Cornelius.
Ser. Sulpitius. Sp. Servilius.
L. Papirius. L. Veturius.

Livie declareth these fixe for Tribunes militarie this yeere. Diodorus rehearseth but three, namely, T. Quintus, Servius Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius. What surnames all these caried, and with what numeral notes (signifying how often they had borne the office) they are to bee marked, the Capitoline fragments doe shew; wherein they stand thus, Capitolinus Maluginensis, L. Prætextatus, III., Sp. Servilius, Strickius, L. Papirius Crassus, L. Furius Crassus, Cicirinus.

386

Two Dictators without any curule magistrats of State besides.

Presently in the verie beginning of the yeere, they proceeded to put it to the trial of a final issue, what should become of the foresaid laws proposed by Licinius and Sextius. When the tribes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the lawes were not hindered by the negatives of their Colleagues Rrrrr iij comming comming betweene; the nobles began then, to quake for feare, and in all hast betooke them to their two last helpes and meanes of refuge, the soveraigne and absolute government, and the principall citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominat a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Camillus was the man; who tooke unto him for Generall of the horsemen, L. Aemilius. But when the cheefetaines & ring-leaders of the Commons, dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camillus, he (as Livie writeth) resigned up his Dictatorship. Plutarch also testifieth the same: who likewise avoucheth the cause thereof, which Livie goeth about to disprove. But both Livie and Plutarch doe affirme, that in the rowme of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a second Dictator created. Livie saith it was P. Manlius. Plutarch suppresseth his name: but they agree both, that C. Licinius was the Generall of the horse. Howbeit, they meane not both, one and the selfesame man. For Livie saith and that truly, that it was he who had been Tribune militarie in Consuls authoritie before: But Plutarch nameth him, who was the authour of the sedition and of the new lawes: wherein hee faulteth. For the captaine of the foresaid sedition, was this yeere also made Tribune of the Commons and Generall of the horse at one time he could not be. And therefore Onuphrius thinketh him to have beene the sonne of P. Licinius Calvus militarie Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Pub. Licinius, who of the Commons was the first Tribune militarie. Of this, see more in his Kalender.

A. Cornelius. II. M. Cornelius.
L. Veturius. M. Geganius.
Lulus P. Manlius. P. Valerius. VI.

Livie exhibiteth these Tribb. militarie before named for this yeer, whom Diodorus overpasseth. Their surnames, together with the notes signifying how often they had borne this honourable dignitie, are thus expressed in the Capitoline fragments. Cossus II. . . . Maluginensis II. . . . Macerinus. L. Veturius. Crassus Cicurinus I. . . . P. Valerius Petitus Poplicola, V. I. P. Manlius Capitolinus II.

L. Sextius. L. Aemilius.

When L. Sextius and C. Licinius, Tribb. of the Common chosen the tenth time, were more & more eager & instant in the publishing of their lawes, in the end the authoritie both of Dictator and Senate, was conquered by the strong hand of the Tribunes. For they prevailed, notwithstanding al the nobilitie was against it, that there should be holden a solemn assembly for election of Consuls: and that, (by vertue of their lawes which they carried cleere before them) the one of the Consuls should be a Commoner. By which meanes, L. Sextius was the first Consul created from out of the Commons. But when the nobles denied flatly to approve the same by their assent, inso much as the Commons were at the point of insurrection and readie to leave the citie; the discord & dissension was at length taken up and appeased by the mediation of the Dictator: and as the nobilitie was content to yeeld unto the communitie a Consull, so the Commons graunted unto the nobles one Pretour or lord cheefe justice within the citie, & him to be created from out of the nobilitie. Graunted also unto them now first it was, that two Ediles Curule should be chosen out of the Patritij. The Commons conferred the Consulship upon L. Sextius (by whose law it was first obtained) and for companion in government hee had L. Aemilius Mamercus. Thus much Livie and Plutarch who altogether with Cassiodorus put down for Consuls, L. Aemilius a Patritian, and L. Sextius a Commoner. The same, Diodorus nameth La. Aemilius Mamercus, and Lu. Lateranus. Now this Lateranus is the surname of Sextius, as appeareth in a table of record in the Capitoll, wherein the Consuls are thus to be scene, Mamercinus, and L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus: as also in the Sicilian registers they are called Mamercinus and Lateranus. In the booke entituled De viris Illustribus of famous men, wee find written that it was not L. Sextius, but C. Licinius Stolo, who was the first Consull chosen out of the communitie.

L. Genutius. Q. Servilius.

Diodorus, Livie, and Cassiodorus shew unto us for Consuls, L. Genutius, and Q. Servilius: Of whome Orosius also and Eutropius make mention. According to the records of the Capitoll, the Cons. in this first Consulship, is thus written. Q. Servilius, son of Q. nephew of Quintus Abala, together with L. Genutius, but in the second, the son of M. nephew of Cn. surnamed Amentinensis. In the Sicilian registers they they be written Genutius and Cartius, but corruptly as Sigonius thinketh.

C. Sulpitius Peticus. C. Licinius Stolo.

These bee the Consuls reported by Livie and Cassiodorus. Diodorus concealeth their surnames. Valerius Max. in his second booke and first chapter maketh mention of them, & so doth Plutarch in his problemes. But hee whom all other writers name Stolo, the Capitoline records nominate Calvus: as also the Sicilian, which deliver their surnames Peticus and Calvus.

L. Aemilius Mamercus. II. Cn. Genutius.

Livie & Cassiodorus declare these for Consuls: whom Diodorus in his sixteenth booke nameth Cn. Genutius and L. Aemilius. In the Capitoll tables in this manner, they bee set downe . . . Mamercinus II. & Cn. Genutius sonne of M. and nephew of M. Amentinensis. But in the Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and σύλλα.

Q. Servilius Abala. II. L. Genutius. II.

Diodorus nameth the Consuls of this yeere, Q. Servilius and Q. Genutius. The Sicilian registers, Abala and Genutius. Livie and Cassiodorus, Q. Servilius Hala and L. Genutius. These are they who three yeeres before were matched together in the same government.

C. Sulpitius. C. Licinius Calvus.

These are by Livie recorded Consuls this yeere. Cassiodorus writeth them thus, C. Sulpitius II. and C. Licinius. Diodorus in this wise, C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius. Sigonius supposeth they be the same, who three yeeres before were colleagues. The Sicilian registers give unto Licinius the surname, not of Calvus as before, but of Stolo: and Sulpitius they surname Peticus.

394

C. Peticus Libo. M. Fabius Ambustus.

Livie and Cassiodorus write the Consuls for this yeere were, C. Peticus Balbus: & M. Fabius Ambustus. But Diodorus, M. Fabius and C. πάλιος, corruptly for πικελιος. The Capitoline writers give them surnames divers from Livie: for they call Libo, πικελιος; but he, Balbus. And the Sicilian registers goe with those of the Capitoll.

M. Popilius Lanatus. Cn. Manlius.

Livie and Cassiodorus name this yeere Consuls in this sort; but Diodorus calleth them, M. Popilius Lanatus, & Cn. Manlius Imperatorius. This was the first man of the Popilij surnamed Lanatus. The reason of which name Cicero rendereth in his booke Brutus, saying, M. Popilius being Consull, and at the same time offering sacrifice in his robe called Lana, for that hee was Flamin to Carmentis, upon newes brought unto him that the commons were up and risen in a commotion against the Nobles, came in that attire & habit as he was into the assembly; and what with his authoritie of countenance, and what with his eloquence of speech, appeased the sedition.

396

C. Fabius. C. Plantius

Livie and Cassiodorus have these above-named for the Consuls this yeere: but in Diodorus they are named M. Fabius and C. Plotius. In the Capitoline records . . . Ambustus and C. Plantius Proculus.

397

C. Martius. Cn. Manlius.

Diodorus, Livie, and Cassiodorus name the Consuls of this yeere, C. Martius and Cn. Manlius. This Cn. Manlius was Consull the first time, two yeeres before. Cuspinians booke and the Greek records, have Rutilius and Capitolinus.

M. Fabius Ambustus. II. M. Popilius Lanatus II.

This yeeres Consuls are with these names entituled by Livie & Cassiodorus. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames & the numerall notes. Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, set them thus downe, Ambustus II. and Lanatus.

C. Sulpitius Peticus. III. M. Valerius Poplicola.

In the foure hundred yeere from the foundation of the citie, and the thirtie five after that that it was by the Gaules woon, the commons after eleven yeeres did forgoe their hold of the Consulship, and upon an Interregencie, both Coss. of the Patrij entered into government, to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus. III. M. Valerius Poplicola, as Livie saith. The same Consuls, Diodorus, Cassiodorus, and the Sicilian registers, do report. But why the account of time made by Livie, disagreeeth from this reckoning, Sigonius and Onuphrius in his kalender doe give a reason.

M. Fabius Ambustus. III. T. Quintius or M. Popilius.

IN this yeere also, according to Livie, both Coss. were Patrij, namely M. Fabius Ambustus the third time, with T. Quintius: although hee writeth, that in some Annales in stead of Titus Quintius, hee found Marcus Popilius Consull. With Livie accordeth Diodorus and Cassiodorus, Solinus also, who in his fortie one chapter out of Cornelius Nepos writeth, that Alexander was borne when M. Fabius Ambustus & T. Quintius Capitolinus were Consuls. Cuspinians booke, setteth forth Ambustus & Capitolinus. But these Consuls and those that follow, are in the Sicilian registers concealed.

C. Sulpitius Peticus. IIII. M. Valerius Poplicola. III.

BOth Consuls created this yeere were Patrij, and namely those who are here set down, after Livie and Cassiodorus. Diodorus omitteth both their surnames, and also the numerall notes, and setteth after the former Consuls, M. Valerius and C. Sulpitius.

P. Valerius Poplicola. C. Martius Rutilus.

TO L. Valerius Poplicola, was given in fellowship of government this yeere, C. Martius Rutilus of the commons, as Livie saith. These Cassiodorus calleth P. Valerius and C. Martius Rutilus the second time. Diodorus nameth them M. Fabius and P. Valerius. The Sicilian registers intermingle them confusedly with those of the next yeere, matching Rutilus and Pennius together.

403

C. Sulpitius Peticus. . . T. or K. or C. Quintius Pennus.

THe Coss. for this yeere created, were C. Sulpitius Peticus, and T. Quintius Pennus. Some put to Quintius the name Cass, others Caius. Livie and Cassiodorus nameth them thus, C. Sulpitius Peticus and T. Quintius Pennus: but Diodorus C. Sulpitius and C. Quintius.

M. Popilius Lanus. L. Cornelius Scipio.

Livie writeth, that for Consuls this yeere the commons yeelded M. Popilius Lanus, and the nobles L. Cornelius Scipio. Cassiodorus setteth them forth under the name of M. Popilius Lanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Scipio. Diodorus nameth them, C. Cornelius and M. Popilius: and the Sicilian registers barely Scipio and Lanus.

L. Furius Camillus. P. Claudius Crassus.

Livie Furius Camillus the Dictatour, restored the nobles againe to their former possession of the Consulship: and beeing himselfe for that good demerit created Consul, with the great love and heartie affection of the nobles, nominated for his Colleague, Publius Claudius Crassus. Thus saith Livie. The same Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus. But Diodorus nameth them Aemilius and T. Quintius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Crassus. Cicero in Cato maketh mention of these Consuls, saying that Plato came to Tatentum, when L. Camillus and P. Claudius were Consuls: Gellius likewise, 9 booke 11 chapter.

M. Valerius Corvus. M. Popilius Lanus. IIII.

Manus Manlius Torquatus being Dictator, declared for Consull with the exceeding favor of the people, M. Valerius Corvus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence, and being but three and twentie yeeres old. This Corvus had joined with him in the Consulship from out of the commons, M. Popilius Lanus the third time, as saith Livie & Cassiodorus. But Diodorus three yeeres after nominateth M. Valerius and M. Popilius. In the fragment of the Capitoll thus only it is found, M. Valerius, M. F. M. N. Corvus Consull. In the Sicilian registers Corvinus and Lanus.

P. Manlius Torquatus. C. Plantius.

Livie and Cassiodorus nameth them for Consuls this yeere. Cuspinians kalender and and the Sicilian records, Torquatus and Venno. In a fragment of the Capitoll there is to be read the surname of Manlius, Imperiosus Torquatus.

M. Valerius Corvus. II. C. Patellus.

These are named Consuls by Livie and Cassiodorus: but Cuspinians Kalender and the registers of Sicilie, shew for Consuls, Corvinus and Libo. As for the name C. Patellus, it is described by his Dictatourship, which (according to the Capitoll evidences) he bare in the yeere 440: for in a fragment (testifying his Consulship) there appeareth no more but one of his surnames, Visolus.

M. Fabius Dors. Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus.

These were the Consuls created for this yeere, as Livie and Cassiodorus write. Diodorus also (although not in the right place) alledgeth M. Fabius and Ser. Sulpitius Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Dors and Camerinus. Both these Consuls were Patrij, which Livie omitted.

C. Martius Rutilus. III. T. Manlius Torquatus. II.

Livie and Cassiodorus avow these for Coss. this yeere. Diodorus likewise delivereth unto us, C. Martius and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers, Rutilus and Torquatus. Frontinus also in his second booke of Stratagems speaketh of them:

M. Valerius Corvus. III. A. Cornelius Cossus.

Livie and Cassiodore both together report, that these were chosen Coss. for this yeere. Diodorus, Cicero in his booke of Divination, and Frontinus, name them, M. Valerius and A. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Valerius and Cossus: both of them are Patrij. But hee that hath written of famous men, calleth them Valerius Max. and Cornelius Cossus.

C. Martius Rutilus. IV. Q. Servilius.

Livie and Cassiodorus declare Coss. for this yeere, C. Martius and Q. Servilius. Diodorus, Q. Servilius and Martius Rutilus. The Sicilian registers, Abala & Rutilus. This is that, Q. Servilius Abala who was master of the horse in the 493 yeere.

C. Plantius. II. L. Aemilius Mamercinus.

The Consuls that followed, were C. Plantius the second time, and L. Aemilius Mamercinus, as witnesse Livie and Cassiodorus: but L. Aemilius and C. Plotius, as testifieth Diodorus: and as the Sicilian registers say, Venno and Mamercinus. Cuspinians kalender set forth for this yeere, Venno the second time, and Mamercinus.

T. Manlius Torquatus. III. P. Decius Mus.

Titus Manlius Torquatus the third time, and Pub. Decius Mus, bare the Consulship this yeere, as Livie and Cassiodorus report. Diodorus nameth them, T. Manlius Torquatus and P. Decius. The Sicilian registers, Torquatus and Mus. Zonaras, Torquatus the third time, and Decius. Of the same Consuls Plinie speaketh in his 22 booke and 5 chap. Valerius also in his 1 booke and 5 chap. besides others.

415

T. Aemilius Mamercinus. Q. Publilius Philo.

Titus Aemilius Mamercinus, & Q. Publilius Philo, are by Livie reckoned Coss. for this yeere. Diodorus passeth over their surnames. The Greeke records shew unto us, Mamercinus and Philo. As for Philo, he is described out of the tables of the Capitoll.

416

L. Furius Camillus. C. Menius.

Thus say Livie and Cassiodorus. Diodorus hath L. Furius and μενιος, but corruptly. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Menius. The Capitoll monuments of triumphs, L. Furius Camillus, and C. Menius. Plinie in his 34 booke and 5. chap. maketh mention of Caius Menius, Consull.

417

C. Sulpitius Longus. P. Aelius Pater.

Livie and Cassiodorus write, that these Coss. followed. Diodorus putteth down C. Sulpitius, and L. Papirius. The Sicilian registers, have Longus and Pater.

418

L. Papirius Crassus. K. Diutius.

Livie Papirius Crassus, and K. Diutius, were this yeeres Coss. as witnesse Livie, Cassiodorus, dorus, and Diodorus also, but for leaving out the surname Crassus. In the Sicilian registers they are named, Crassus and Diutius. As touching these Consuls, Cicero in his epistle to Pætus, writeth thus; L. Papirius Crassus, foure yeeres after he was Dictatour, was made Consull with K. Diutius.

M. Valerius Corvus IIII. M. Atilius Regulus.

This yeere, when the Ausones that inhabited the citie Cales, took armes and combined with the Sidicines, Mar. Valerius Corvus, a right noble Generail, was created Consull the fourth time, having to his colleague (as Livie writeth) M. Atilius Regulus. Cassiodorus likewise declareth the same for Consuls; and so doth Diodorus, but that he leaveth out their surnames: which appeare extant in the Sicilian registers.

T. Veturius. Sp. Posthumus.

The Dictator held an assembly for the election of Consuls, wherein were created (according to Livie) these above-named. So say Cassiodorus also and Diodorus. Zonaras nameth them, Tiber. Calvinus, and Sp. Posthumus; and right well, as Sigonius thinketh: for Tiberius was the fore-name of the Veturij. The Greeke records, and Culpinians booke, have Albinus and Calvinus.

421

Interregents, all one yeere.

Sigonius and Onuphrius insert this one yeere without Consuls, besides the account of the yeeres, according to the Capitoll monuments, albeit they see neither in Livie nor in any other, mention thereof; and all to make up the totall summe collected by Varro. And that the said yeere should at this time especially be interposed, the tables of the Capitoline records doe shew. For whereas in them thus engraven it is, M. Valerius Corvus Consull the fourth time, in the yeere of the citie 419; and againe L. Aemilius and C. Plautius, in the yeere 414: to the end that these records might agree one with another, or necessitie there must be put a yeere betweene. For leave out that, then, both L. Aemilius the Consull should fall upon the yeere 414, and the totall summe of the yeer in Varro and the Capitoline tables be overthrowen. That this odde yeere was now above all other times to be cast betweene, Gregorie Haloander (who left in writing a Chronologie of the Consuls) saw long before them: for he over-passed this yeere wholly, noted without Consuls. But Sigonius and Onuphrius are of opinion, that this yeer there was an Anarchie, and the commonweale without Consuls or other magistrates of state, by occasion of the pestilence, whereof Livie writeth.

A. Cornelius II. Cn. Domitius.

Aulus Cornelius (the second time Cof. with Cn. Domitius) is by Livie and Cassiodorus set downe. Diodorus nameth them A. Cornelius and C. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calvinus and Cossus.

423

M. Claudius Marcellus. C. Valerius.

After this, were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Valerius, as Livie and Cassiodorus report. In Diodorus also they be set downe by the name of C. Valerius, and Mar. Clodius. Livie saith, that he findeth in the Annales, the surnames of Valerius diversly put downe, namely, Flaccus and Potitus. Orofius calleth these Consuls, Claudius Marcellus, and Valerius Flaccus: the Sicilian registers, Potitus and Marcellus. Sigonius and Onuphrius retain the surnames, that it may seeme, how to the old surname Potitus of the House Valeria, this new surname of Flaccus is a later addition.

L. Papirius Crassus II. L. Plautius Vennon.

These Consuls are by Livie and Cassiodorus recited this yeere. Diodorus concealeth their surnames. The Sicilian registers make them knowne by the names of Crassus and Vennon.

L. Aemilius Mamercinus. C. Plautius.

Next to them (according to Livie and Cassiodorus) were L. Aemilius Mamercinus, and C. Plautius created Consuls. Diodorus nominateth L. Papirius with L. Plotius. The Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Decianus. How both these are to be described, their triumphs upon record record in the Capitoll do evidently shew. These Consuls entred upon their government the first day of Iulie.

P. Plautius Proculus. P. Cornelius Scapula.

Livie and Cassiodorus put downe [for Consuls] P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula. Diodorus, P. Cornelius, and A. Posthumus. The Sicilian registers, Vennon and Scipio. Onuphrius thinketh this Plautius ought to be fore-named not Publius but Caius: who in his Consulship which he bare afterwards with Appius Cæcus, was surnamed Venox (as Frontinus supposeth) for finding certaine springs and vaines of water within the earth.

C. Plautius Proculus. Q. Pubilius Philo. II.

Livie and Cassiodorus match together in the Consulship for this yeere, L. Cornelius Lentulus, & Q. Pubilius Philo. Diodorus, L. Cornelius and Quintus Pubilius. The Sicilian registers Lentulus and Philo.

L. Papirius Mugillanus Cusor. C. Petilius.

Caius Petilius and L. Papirius are by Livie nominated Consuls this yeere. C. Petilius the third time, and L. Papirius Mugillanus, by Cassiodorus. Solinus maketh mention of these Consuls in his five and thirtieth chapter. As for Papirius, Livie indeed surnameth him here Mugillanus, but hee saith that hee findeth him in other Annales by the name of Cusor. In the Greeke records they be, Libo and Cusor. Now as touching C. Petilius, he is to bee written with the numerall note II. and not III. as Sigonius and Onuphrius doe adimonish. For it is not the same man who was Consull in the 393 yeere, but his sonne.

Livie and Cassiodorus put downe for Consuls, Lu. Furius Camillus the second time, and Iunius Brutus Scæva. Diodorus, L. Furius, and D. Iunius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Brutus.

L. Furius, unto whome the charge of Samnium fell by lot, fortun'd by occasion offickenesse to forgoe the warre there, and was commaunded to nominate for the managing of martiall affaires a Dictatour: whereupon he pronounced L. Papirius Cusor, the bravest warrior in those daies, by whom Q. Fabius Rullianus was named great maister of the horse. Afterwards Cusor turned him out of that maistership of horse, because without his warrant hee had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Samnites when himselfe was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Auspices anew: and in his roume hee substituted L. Papirius Crassus. Thus write Livie, Eutropius, and Valerius, in the second booke.

C. Sulpicius Longus. II. Q. Aemilius L. Aulius Cerretanus.

L. Furius Papirius the Dictatour, before he left his magistracie, created Consuls, C. Sulpicius Longus, II. and Quintus Aemilius Cerretanus. Some Annales have Aulius. Thus much Livie. In like manner the Sicilian registers have Longus and Cerretanus. But Diodorus corruptly for Aulus hath Aelius.

432

Q. Fabius. L. Fulvius.

Livie and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls this yeere, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius: whome the Capitoll records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, and L. Fulvius Corvus. Mervell it is therefore, that in the Sicilian registers they are put down, Cusor and Sylla.

433

T. Veturius Calvinus. Sp. Posthumus.

This yeere Livie and Cassiodorus set forth for Consuls, T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Posthumus. Cicero in his third booke of Officines writeth, that they were twice Consuls. Zonaras calleth the one of them T. Calvinus, by a familiar fore-name unto that house and kinned of the Veturij. The Greeke records exhibite unto us Calvinus and Albinus. Of these Consuls as also of the Caudine peace, Cicero in his booke of old age, Plinie also in his booke of famous men, Gellius in his 17 booke and 21 chapter, Florus in his first booke and 16 chapter, and Orofius in his third booke and 15 chapter, doe make mention.

P. Sempronius Sophus. P. Sulpitius Saverrio.

THe Consuls next following were P. Sulpitius Saverrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus, according to Livie and Cassiodorus. In Diodorus they are written P. Sulpitius and P. Sempronius. In the Greeke registers, they stand Sempronius and Saverrio. Plinie writeth of these Consuls in his 33 booke: but Sempronius hee calleth Longus. Both of them are described thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitoll, for in their Consulship, there is no more to be seen but Sophus and Publius.

L. Genutius. Ser. Cornelius.

Diodorus, Livie and Cassiodorus, report for Consuls this yeere, L. Genutius, and Servius Cornelius. The Sicilian registers have Aventinus and Lentulus. The Capitoline writers put unto Cornelius the surname of Lentulus.

M. Livius Dentor. M. Aemilius.

Livie nameth for Consuls this yeere M. Livius and C. Aemilius. Cassiodorus, M. Livius and L. Aemilius. Diodorus, M. Livius and M. Aemilius. As for the forename to Aemilius, Sigonius and Onuphrius doe thinke that more credit is to be given unto Diodorus, than others: especially, seeing that in Livie there is mention made the yeere following of M. Aemilius Paulus Generall of the horsemen, whome they all thinke to bee the same man that this Consull, M. Livius is written Dentor in the Capitoll records, which surname Livie in another place addeth to the Livij. Cuspinians booke in like manner setteth downe Dentor and Pamilius as the surnames of these Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Dentor and Aemilius.

Two Dictatours, and no Consuls.

THis yeere also of two Dictatours without Consuls, Onuphrius inserteth in his kalender, howbeit directed thereto by the evidence of the Capitoll fragments: to the end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all respects, which, if this yeere were over-slipped should be wholly overthrowne: although Diodore, Livie, and Cassiodore dissent there from, and leave out this yeere altogether. Whereof see Onuphrius more at large in his Kalender upon the yeere 453.

M. Valerius. Q. Apuleius Pansa.

Immediately after M. Livius and M. Aemilius, Livie and Cassiodorus letting passe the yeere of two Dictatours without Consuls, bring in M. Valerius & Q. Apuleius Pansa for Consuls. The Greeke records shew Corvinus and Pansa. It seemeth that Livie by Marcus Valerius meaneth Maximus, for that hee saith that presently upon his Dictatourship he was made Consull. Now that Mar. Valerius Max. was Dictatour the yeere before, he writeth plainly.

455

M. Fulvius Petus. T. Manlius Torquatus.

Livie and Cassiodorus declare for Consuls this yeere, M. Fulvius Petus and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers have Patinus and Torquatus. Livie saith that Q. Fabius refused the Consulship offered unto him without any suite of his. But T. Manlius the Consull was by lot appointed to levie warre against Hetruria, which tooke armes and prepared for warre against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entred into the enemies confines, but as hee exercised among men of armes, and chanced to turne about his horse upon a full carrier, hee was cast from his backe: whereupon (for the present) hee lay for dead, and within three daies after the said fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in generall by their suffrages chose M. Valerius Consull, whom the Senate purposed to have made Dictatour. Thus much Livie. By M. Valerius hee meaneth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his booke of old age, & Valerius Max. in his seventh booke and foure eight chapter, to have beene Consull the sixth time, & that between this and the first there were 46 yeeres, although Plutarch in the life of C. Marius saith they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvinus and not Corvus.

L. Cornelius Scipio. Cn. Fulvius.

Cneus Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio are recorded Consuls by Livie and Cassiodorus: but but Scipio and Centumalus, by Cuspinians booke: Scipio & Maximus by the Greeke records.

Q. Fabius Max. IV. P. Decius Mus III.

Livie and Cassiodorus alledge for Coss. this yeere, Q. Fabius Max. the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus, thrice. The same Consuls, Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records deliver unto us. The author that writeth of famous men, and Frontinus in his booke of Stratagemes, speake of P. Decius thrice Consull.

458

L. Volumentius. Appius Claudius.

Livie and Cassiodorus declare for Consuls this yeere: even the same men who in their former Consulship were matched together, as Livie and Cassiodorus write: but in the Sicilian registers they are found written, Claudius and Volens. Howbeit Cicero in his booke entitled Cato, reporteth, that betwene the two Consulships of App. Cacus were ten yeeres.

Q. Fabius V. P. Decius IV.

Livie and Cassiodorus both witnesse, that the Consuls next following, were Q. Fabius the 5 time, and P. Decius the 4 time, who had been companions together alreadie in 2 Consulates and in one Consulship. The Sicilian registers have Rullus and Mus: of which Consuls Cicero speaketh very often; Valerius Max. likewise, Paterculus also, Plutarch, Frontinus in his first booke of Stratagemes, the author of the booke of famous men, Eutropius, Orosius, and others: who all report, that this Consull P. Decius, following the example of his father, offered himselfe to die for the Roman legions, and by his death purchased a notable victorie to the people of Rome.

L. Postumius Megellus. M. Atilius Regulus.

THe Consuls next following, were L. Postumius Megellus, and M. Atilius Regulus, as Livie and Cassiodorus write. In the Sicilian records, their surnames are Megellus and Regulus.

461

L. Papirius Cursor. Sp. Carvilius.

After Livie and Cassiodorus, the Coss. this yeere, were L. Papirius Cursor, & Sp. Carvilius.

Q. Fabius Gurgus Max. Decius Junius Brutus, son of Scervolini.

The yeere following had Consuls, Q. Fabius Gurgus, and D. Junius Brutus Scerva, as witnesse Livie and Cassiodorus. Zonaras nameth them, Junius Brutus and Q. Fabius Max. Cuspinians Kalender, Maximus and Scerva. The Sicilian registers, Brutus and Maximus. Livie, Plinie in his 7 booke, the capitoll tables, and Zonaras, have delivered, that this Fabius was the son of Q. Max. Rullianus, who had been 5 times Consull before. And here an end of the Consuls for the first ten bookes.

L. Postumius. C. Iunius.

Since that after this Consulship, ten bookes of Livie next ensuing be lost, whome hitherto wee have had for the most sufficient witnesse of this storie, so as now we are in manner destitute and deprived of the best helps of Annals, namely, Diodorus, Dionysius, and Livie: from hence forward wee will use principally in digesting and reckoning the yeeres by the Consuls, the authoritie and testimonie of Cassiodorus, the Sicilian records, and Cuspinians booke: yet will wee not in the meane while reject what helpe soever shall be ministred unto us by others. For this yeere therefore Cassiodorus writeth, that L. Postumius and C. Iunius, were created Coss. whose surnames, Megellus, and Brutus Bubulcus, have not been left out so much as in Cuspinians kalender, nor in the Sicilian records. Livie also maketh mention of them in his 28 booke, saying thus, Lu. Postumius Megellus the interregent, was created Consull with C. Bubulcus, by that very court and assembly which himselfe called and held.

464

P. Cornelius Rufinus. M. Curius Dentatus.

The Coss. this yeere are recorded by Cassiodorus, Pub. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. Curius Dentatus.

Sssij

Dentatus: for whom in the Sicilian registers, appeare Maximus the third time, and Mus the sixth time. But of those forenamed Consuls, Cicero maketh mention in his booke, entituled Caro; Paterculus in his first booke, Valerius Max. in his sixth booke and 3 chap. Plinie also in his 7 booke and 50 chap. Now this M. Curius was called Dentatus, as Plinie writeth in his 6 booke and 16 chap. for that hee came into the world with teeth.

465

M. Valerius. Q. Cadius.

Marcus Valerius and Q. Cadius were afterwards Consuls, as saith Cassiodorus. The old booke of Cuspinian putteth to them the surnames of Corvinus and Noctua: which in the Sicilian registers are overpassed. The Greek records shew unto us, Maximus and Mus: for Maximus was a surname also of the Valerij Corvini.

Q. Martins. P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus this yeere delivereth for Consuls, Q. Martins and P. Cornelius. Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, adde their surnames, Tremulus II. and Arvinus II. who had been Consuls together once before.

467

M. Marcellus. Sp. Nautius.

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this yeere, M. Marcellus and Sp. Nautius. The Greeke records and Cuspinians booke, have Marcellus and Rutius.

468

M. Valerius. C. Aelius.

Marcus Valerius and C. Aelius, are raunged in this year for Consuls by Cassiodorus. Cuspinians booke putteth forth, Maximus and Potius: but the Greeke records, Potius and Potius. Now you must thinke, that both Maximus & Potius, are the surnames of the Valerij.

469

C. Claudius. M. Aemilius.

For this yeeres Consuls, Cassiodorus hath C. Claudius and M. Aemilius. The Greeke records and Cuspinians booke, Canina and Lepi- dus: whereof the former is the surname of Claudius, the latter of Aemilius.

C. Servilius. L. Caelius.

By Cassiodorus, C. Servilius and L. Caelius Metellus, are placed Consuls in this yeere; for whereas in some copies of Cassiodorus, in stead of L. Caelius, is written Cabius, that is a fault; as Sigonius and Onuphrius have noted. To Servilius this Consull, the Greeke records adde the surname of Turca, whome they put down Consull with Dento, they would say Denter, as both Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose. For Denter is a surname also given to the Cacilij, as appeareth by Livie.

471

P. Cornelius Dolabella. Cn. Domitius.

Cassiodorus inserteth P. Cornel. Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius for Consuls. Cuspinians Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvus. The Sicilian registers, Dolabella Maximus. And some thinke, that Maximus was the surname of Dolabella, which hee seemeth to have acquired by the honor that he had woon in the war against the Gaules.

C. Fabricius. Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in for Consuls, C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: but the Sicilian registers, Luscinus and Papus. Of them Cicero in his booke Laelius, maketh mention in this manner: Vee see that Papus Aemilius was familiarly acquainted with C. Luscinus; for so we have heard our fathers say, that they were two Consuls together, and companions in the Censorship. Moreover, Valerius in his chap. where hee treateth of Poverty, maketh mention of C. Fabricius, and Q. Aemilius Papus. This Aemilius, Plutarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus.

L. Aemilius. Q. Martins.

There followed Consuls, as Cassiodorus sheweth, L. Aemilius and Q. Martins; unto whome, Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, give also their surnames, Barbula and Philippus: and the same also is evident by the records in the Capitoll of their triumphs.

P. Val-

P. Valerius. T. Cornucaninus.

Pub. Valerius and Tit. Cornucaninus, are by Cassiodorus placed in this yeere for Coss. The Greeke records, Cuspinians booke, Florus, Orosius, and Eutropius, give to Valerius the surname of Lævinus. And Plutarch hath Λαβινος for Lævinus.

475

P. Sulpitius. P. Decius.

Next after those, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Sulpitius Consull with P. Decius. The Sicilian registers, have Savennio and Mus. Cicero in his 2 booke, entituled De Fin. and in his Tusculan disputations, saith, That this Pub. Decius was the son of that P. Decius who vowed himselfe to death in the Samnites and Gaules waire.

476

C. Fabricius. Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: whome Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, call Luscinus the second time, and Papus. That these were fellows together once before in the Consulate, Cicero writeth in his book Laelius, Plutarch in Pyrrhus, Gellius 3 booke chap. 8. Eutropius, and Zonaras, make report of the same.

P. Cornelius. C. Iunius.

Pub. Cornelius, and C. Iunius, are rehearsed for Consuls this yeer by Cassiodorus. Cuspinians booke hath Rufinus the second time, and Brutus. The Greeke records, Rufinus and Babulcius. Zonaras hath R. finus and Iunius. Of P. R. finus twice Consull, Cic. in his 2 booke Of a perfect orator, Valer. Max. in his 3 booke and 4 chap. Gellius in his 4 booke and 8 chap. in his 17 booke likewise and 21 chap. and last of all, Frontinus in his booke of Stratagemes, make mention.

478

Q. Fabius. C. Genutius.

Cassiodorus reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Genutius Coss. The Sicilians registers have Gurges and Clepsina. Of these Consuls, Orosius maketh mention in this wife: When Fabius Gurges was the second time Consul with Genutius Clepsina, a grievous pestilence reigned both in the cittie, and also in the territorie about it.

M. Curius. L. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus and Eutropius deliver unto us for Consuls, M. Curius and L. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers, Dentatus and Lentulus. This is the third Consulate of M. Curius, which together with Lentulus Consullship, is drawne out of the Capitoll records of triumph this yeere.

480

Sp. Cornelius. M. Curius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this yeeres Consuls, Servius Cornelius and M. Curius. Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, Merenda, and Dentatus the third time. This M. Curius is now Consull the fourth time, for, thrice he was before. Concerning this Servius Cornelius Merenda, Plinie relateth and writeth, that hee received a princely coronet of gold at the hands of L. Lentulus the Consull of the former yeere, for winning a town of the Samnites.

481

C. Fabricius. C. Claudius.

Cassiodorus setteth downe, C. Fabricius and C. Claudius Consuls: the Sicilian records, Licinius and Canina: Cuspinians kalender, Licinius and Cinna. Eutropius, Fabius Licinius and C. Claudius Canina. Velleius, Fabius Do so and Claud. Canina. Whereby it may be understood, that these Consuls were called, Fabius Do so Licinius, and Caius Claudius Canina: for Dorso was an old name of the Fabij.

L. Papirius Censor. Sp. Corvilius.

Next after them, Cassiodorus nominateth for Consuls, Sp. a. vilus and L. Papirius Cursor. The records both of Sicilie and Cuspinian, have Cursor and Maximus. Both these were now Consuls the second time, as appeareth by their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll. Frontinus speaketh of them in his booke Of water conduits, and Livie in his 24 booke.

Sssiiij

C. Quin-

483

C. Quintius. L. Genutius.

It is reported by Cassiodorus, that C. Quintius and L. Genutius were Consuls. Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, set to their surnames, Claudius and Clepsina. Livie in his 7 booke speaketh of one Tit. Quintius lame of one legge, from whome haply this surname is drawne.

484

C. Genutius. Cn. Cornelius.

Reported thereate for Consuls, this yeere by Cassiodorus, C. Genutius and Cn. Cornelius; whose surnames were Clepsina & Blasio, as it appeareth in Cuspinians booke. This Caius Genutius is the same, who before-time was Consull. As for C. Blasio, he is described by his Cenforship standing upon record in the Capitoll. The Greeke records over-passe them both.

P. Sempronius. 2 or after Q. Ogulpius.
App. Claudius. 3 or more, 2 Fabius Pictor.

After Cornelius and Genutius Consuls, Cassiodorus bringeth in Pub. Sempronius, and App. Claudius, and of purpose over-skippeith Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor. Zonaras, Q. Gallus and C. Fabius. Of them speaketh Eutropius, saying; When Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor were Consuls, the Picenates raised warre; and by the Consuls next following, to wit, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, they were vanquished. Plinie also in his 33 booke and 3 chap. When Q. Fabius (quoth hee) was Consull, silver was coined and stamped for money, five yeeres before the [second] Punicke war. These Consuls, Velleius also reckoneth in his first booke. But Sigonius and Onuphrius advertise us, that the booke of Eutropius is verie faultie in one of these Consuls, and that in lieu of Quin. Gulo, it should be read Q. Ogulpius; for of this Gulo, there is in no place besides, any mention: so as they would have, that it should be Q. Ogulpius, son of L. nephew of A. surnamed Galus, who a little before was sent in embassage to Ptolemeus. And it falleth out passing well, that they should match Ogulpius a commoner, with Fabius a Patritian. Also Onuphrius testifieth, that in the most auncient hand-written bookes of Eutropius, the name is found of Ogulpius. And, as both the Greeke records, and also Zonaras, together, with the more auncient and perfect copies of Eutropius, agree to this his judgement: so Hubertus Goltzius likewise in his catalogue of Consuls, embraceth the same: and that which maketh most for the purpose, the old antiquities of coine, witnesseth as much. But in the meane while this is worth the observation, that oftentimes in the most auncient peeeces of money, the letter C is written for G, as for example here, Ocul. Cal. for Ogul. Galba.

P. Sempronius. App. Claudius.

Seeing that wee settle the Consulship of the former yeer, in Ogulpius and Fabius Pictor, and that upon the authoritie of Eutropius, the Greeke records, Cuspinian, Zonaras, Onuphrius, and others; wee will set downe for this yeeres Consuls, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, whome Velleius in his first booke calleth, Sempronius Sophus, and Appius the sonne of Cacus. The Greeke records, Sempronius Rufus Sophus; and Cuspinians booke, Rufus. Moreover, this also Goltzius giveth us to understand, that the surname of this Sempronius is in old peeeces of coine found written without an aspiration [Sophus]; which is no rare thing to be scene in such antiquities: for we read in others of them, Pilippus, T. Ampilius, Gracchus, Pulcher, Triumpus, for Philippus, T. Amphilius, Gracchus, Pulcher, Triumpbus, and such like.

M. Atilius. L. Julius Libo.

Eutropius putteth downe for Consuls, M. Atilius and L. Julius Libo. The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Libo. Cassiodorus, M. Atilius and L. Julius. And both of them are taken forth of the records of capitoll triumphs.

488

D. Iunius. N. Fabius.

Cassiodorus reporteth for Coss. this yeere, D. Iunius and N. Fabius: the Sicilian register, Pera and Pictor: the capitoll records of triumphs, D. Iunius son of D. nephew of D. surnamed Pera, and N. Fabius son of C. nephew of M. surnamed Pictor. Vpon what occasion these Fabij tooke the surname of Pictor, Plinie sheweth in his 35 booke chap. 4. Valer. Max. in his 4 booke and 3 chap. seemeth to note and signifie, that Fabius Gurges and N. Fabius Pictor, lived at one and the same time.

Q. Fabius

Q. Fabius Maximus. L. Mamilius Vitulus.

This yeere also Cassiodorus passeth over. The Greeke records shew, Maximus and Vitulus. Zonaras, Q. Fabius, and Mamilius (no doubt) for Mamilius, by some error and fault of the copies, Cuspinian out of some old booke delivereth unto us for Consuls, Q. Fab. Maximus and Lu. Mamilius. Onuphrius thinketh, that Q. Fab. Maximus Gurges was now thrice Consull.

490

App. Claudius. M. Fulvius.

Besides the capitoll monuments, Polybius in his first booke maketh mention of these Consuls. Gellius also, who calleth them thus, App. Claudius brother of Cacus surnamed Caudex, and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. In like manner Livie, Paternulus, and Plinie in his booke of famous men: as also Appianus, Florus, Frontinus in his 1 booke of Stratagems, Eutropius, Orofius, and Cassiodorus.

M. Valerius. M. Otacilius.

Cassiodorus and Eutropius shew unto us, that M. Valerius and M. Otacilius were Consuls. Zonaras nameth Valerius Max. and Otacilius Crassus. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Maximus Messala and Crassus. Of these Consuls, Verrius Flaccus, Polybius, Cassiodorus, Eutropius, and Macrobius out of Varro make report. As for Macrobius, he rendereth a reason, why M. Valerius was in this government of his named Messala: and Plinie likewise, in his sixth booke and five and thirtie chapter.

L. Posthumus. Q. Mamilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put downe for next Consuls, L. Posthumus and Q. Mamilius. Zonaras nameth them, Postumius Albinus and Quintus Mamilius. The Sicilian registers, Albinus and Vitulus: but the capitoll monuments, Lucius Postumius sonne of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, surnamed Megellus, and Quin. Mamilius sonne of Q. nephew of M. surnamed Vitulus.

493

L. Valerius. T. Otacilius.

Polybius and Cassiodorus match together in the Consulate for this yeere, L. Valerius and T. Otacilius: the surname of Valerius is Flaccus, and of Otacilius, Crassus, as it appeareth upon the capitoll and Sicilian records.

Cn. Cornelius. C. Duilius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras bring in for Coss. Cn. Cornelius and C. Duilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Pub. hee hath Albi. The Sicilian registers shew Scipio and Duilius. Cn. Cornelius Scipio is surnamed also Asina, by the capitall writers, Orofius, Eutropius, and Valerius in his sixth booke chap. 10: of which surname Macrobius writeth thus in his first booke of Saturnalia: The surname of Asina (qd. hee) was given to the Cornelijs, for that the first of the House Cornelia having either bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the solemne manner) hee was required to put in good sureties for securitie, brought into the open market place a shee asse laden with money, and pawned down that presently in stead of pledges.

495

C. Aquilius son of M. L. Cornelius son of L.

There are nominated by Cassiodorus for Consuls, C. Aquilius and L. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Florus and Scipio. Zonaras, C. Florus and L. Scipio. Eutropius and Orofius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Aquilius Florus. Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annales of Eutropius and Orofius.

496

A. Atilius Calatinus. Q. Sulpitius.

Polybius avoucheth for this yeeres Consuls, A. Atilius and C. Sulpitius. Cassiodorus, A. Atilius Calatinus, and C. Sulpitius. The Sicilian registers and Cuspinians Kalender, Calatinus & Paternulus. The capitoll monuments, A. Atilius Calatinus and C. Sulpitius Paternulus. Zonaras, Atilius Calatinus, and Caius Sulpitius. Of these Consuls, Polybius, Cicero, Valerius, Florus, Frontinus in his Stratagems, Plinie the younger, Gellius, Eutropius, and Cassiodorus make mention. But concerning the the forename of Sulpitius Paterculus, the Capitoline tables disagree one from another; to wit, those that carrie the records of the triumphs, from those that shew the Consulships and other magistracies: for in these latter monuments hee is called Quintus, in the former Caius. Whereby Goltzius doth conjecture, that one man was not the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphant and the Consular.

Cn. Cornelius. C. Atilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius, and C. Atilius Serranus, for Consuls: but Polybius, C. Atilius. The Capitoll tables, C. Atilius Regulus. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian registers, have Regulus and Blasius the second time. But how Atilius should come by his surname Serranus, Plinie sheweth in his 18 booke, saying; In these daies the fields were tilled by the very hands of L. Generals themselves, and a man verily would beleeeve thereby, that the ground joyed in a lauréat ploughshare and a triumphant plowman. Him they found a sowing, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, & so tooke he his surname Serranus. As concerning Blasius, all authors well-nere besides, approve the judgement of Cuspinian: but Goltzius supposeth, that hee was not the same man that was Consul before; and therefore hee writeth him the sonne of Cn. nephew of Lu. without putting to the numerall note II.

Q. Cædicius. L. Manlius.

The next Consuls that succeeded, were (by Cassiodorus his saying) Q. Cædicius and L. Manlius. The Sicilian registers name them, Vulso and Cædicius. Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Manlius. Eutropius, M. Atilius Regulus and L. Manlius Vulso: and Polybius, M. Atilius and L. Manlius. Insenus in his 41 book maketh mention of these Consuls. But ye must understand, that Q. Cædicius died while hee was in office, and M. Atilius was substituted in his rounne, and made Consul the second time; as appeareth evidently by the Capitoll tables, wherein it standeth thus upon record, Lu. Manlius Vulso Longus: and in stead of Q. Cædicius, M. Atilius Regulus the second time: as also by Cuspinians booke, wherein is written, Longus and Regulus.

499

M. Æmilius Paulus. Ser. Fulvius Nobilior.

Polybius sheweth for the Coss. this yeere, Ser. Fulvius, and M. Æmilius. Cuspinians Kalender, Nobilior and Paulus. The Sicilian registers, Paulus and Paulus. Cassiodorus and Eutropius, together with the Capitoline records, have Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Æmilius Paulus.

500

Cn. Cornelius. A. Atilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius report for this yeeres Consuls, Cn. Cornelius and A. Atilius. The Capitoll authors write, A. Atilius Calatinus the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina likewise a second time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Asina twice Consul, thus writeth Valerius in his sixt booke: Cneius Cornelius Scipio Asina, who being Consul, was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians at Liparæ when he had by the law of armes lost whatsoever hee had, recovered all againe, and was made Consul the second time: so as, of a Consul hee became a captive, and of a captive twice Consul.

Cn. Servilius. C. Sempronius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put downe for Consuls, Cn. Servilius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian registers, Cæpio and Blasius. Zonaras, Servilius Cæpio and C. Sempronius. Eutropius and Orosius, Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and Sempronius Blasius. Of the same Consuls, Sabinus in his 30 book maketh mention, as also a stone of the Capitoll.

502

C. Aurelius Cotta. P. Servilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in as Coss. C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Geminus. The Sicilian registers, Cotta and Geminus: but those of the Capitoll, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus. Zonaras, Pub. Servilius and C. Aurelius. Cicero in his booke, entituled Lucullus, writeth, that C. Cotta, together with P. Servilius Geminus, was twice Consul. Frontinus also in his fourth booke of Stratagemes, and likewise Orosius, make mention of C. Cotta Consul in Sicilie.

L. Cæcilius Metellus. C. Furius.

Polybius setteth downe for Consuls, L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Pacilius. Zonaras, Cæcilius Metellus, and C. Furius. Cassiodorus, Lu. Cæcilius and C. Furius. Eutropius, Orosius, and a capitoll stone, L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius Pacilius. This is that Lu. Metellus, twice Consul and high priest, of whome Plinie writeth in his seventh booke and three and fortie chapter.

504

C. Atilius Regulus. L. Manlius.

Polybius placeth for this yeeres Consuls, C. Atilius and Lu. Manlius. Cassiodorus, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius. Orosius and a capitoll stone, have C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius Vulso, both Coss. the second time. Zonaras, C. Atilius the brother of Regulus, and L. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Regulus and Vulso.

Cassiodorus and Polybius inferre for Consuls the next yeere, Pub. Claudius and L. Iunius. Zonaras, L. Iunius and Cl. Pulcher. Florus and Suetonius in Tiberius, put to Claudius the surname of Pulcher; and Censorinus to Iunius of Pullus: which also are upon record in the Sicilian and capitoline tables. This P. Claudius, Cicero (in his bookes of Divination, and of the nature of gods) calleth the sonne of Appius Cæcus: but Plinie (in his seventh booke and three and fortie chapter) nameth him his nephew or sonnes sonne: The capitoll writers take part with Cicero. Valerius Maximus in his first booke and fourth chapter, speaketh of the same Consuls.

506

P. Servilius. C. Aurelius.

For Consuls this yeere, Cassiodorus putteth downe P. Servilius and C. Aurelius. Cicero in his booke Lucullus, saith that these were twice Consuls. Which also is apparant by the Capitoll and Sicilian tables: in which their surnames are to be seene, Geminus II. and Cotta II.

507

L. Cæcilius. N. Fabius.

It is recorded by Cassiodorus, that the Consuls of this yeere, were L. Cæcilius and N. Fabius: but Zonaras nameth them, Cæcilius Metellus, and Numerius Fabius. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian registers, have them in this manner; Metellus II. and Buteo II. But the capitoline tables shew them thus, Lu. Cæcilius Metellus II. N. Fabius Buteo II. Plinie also reporteth in his seventh booke, that Metellus was twice Consul.

M. Fabius. M. Otacilius.

Cassiodorus setteth downe as Consuls, M. Fabius and M. Otacilius. The Sicilian registers, Craffius and Licinius. Gellius in his tenth booke and sixt chapter, hath Fabius Licinius and Otacilius Craffius. The capitoll marble stones, M. Fabius Licinius, and M. Otacilius Craffius. Besides Gellius in the place before alledged, Florus likewise in his 19 Breviary upon Livius maketh mention of these Consuls; as also Suetonius in Tiberius.

M. Fabius. C. Atilius.

Cassiodorus reckoneth M. Fabius, and Caius Atilius, Consuls for this yeere. The Sicilian tables, Buteo and Bulbus. But those of the capitoll, M. Fabius Buteo, and C. Atilius Bulbus. Of Fabius the Consuls shipwracke, Florus speaketh out of the nineteenth booke of Livie.

A. Manlius. C. Sempronius.

For this yeeres Consuls, Cassiodorus setteth forth unto us, A. Manlius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian records, Torquatus and Blasius. Cuspinians booke hath Atticus and Blasius. The capitoline tables shew Aul. Manlius Torquatus Atticus, and Caius Sempronius Blasius II.

511

C. Fundanius. C. Sulpitius.

Cassiodorus putteth downe, C. Fundanius, and C. Sulpitius for Consuls. The Sicilian writers, writers, Fundulus and Gallus. The Capitoll monuments, Caius Fundanius Fundulus, and C. Sulpitius Gallus. None besides make mention of them.

C. Lutatius Catulus. A. Postumius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls this yeere, C. Lutatius and Aul. Postumius. The Sicilian records, Catulus and Albinus. Eutropius, and the Capitoll marbles, C. Lutatius Catulus, and A. Postumius Albinus.

Q. Lutatius Cere. A. Manlius.

Cassiodorus, Eutropius, and Orofius, shew for Consuls this yeere, Q. Lutatius, and Aul. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Cere and Torquatus. They of the Capitoll, Q. Lutatius Cere, and Aul. Manlius Torquatus Atticus II. Indeed C. Lutatius Cere, is named for an embassador by Livie in his 42 booke.

C. Claudius Centho. M. Sempronius.

For this year there were Consuls, C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tudianus, according to Cassiodorus and the capitoll writers. The Sicilian records testifie also the same surnames. Of these Consuls likewise, besides the capitoll Writers, Cicero speaketh in his Cato and Brutus, where he calleth this yeere (according to the judgement of Atticus, where to Varro also agreeth) the 514 yeere from the foundation of the citie; as also in his first Tusculane question. So doth Gellius 17 booke 21 chap. and Cassiodorus.

C. Mamilius. Q. Valerius.

Next there followed in Consuls place, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, C. Mamilius and Q. Valerius: but according to the Sicilian registers, Turinus and Falco: and after the capitoll records, C. Mamilius Turinus, and Q. Valerius Falco. Besides Verrius Flaccus and Cassiodorus, Gellius also maketh mention of these Cons. in his 17 booke and 21 chap. So doth Cicero in Brutus and the Tusculane questions, in which yeere they say, that Ennius the poet was borne.

T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

For the yeere following, Cassiodorus hath Consuls, T. Sempronius and Pub. Valerius Gracchus and Falco, in Cuspinians Kalender, and the Sicilian records. Zonaras avoucheth, Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Valerius. The capitoll writers, have T. Sempronius Gracchus, and Pub. Valerius Falco. Orofius speaketh of these Consuls.

517

L. Cornelius. Q. Fulvius.

Next to them, Cassiodorus reporteth for Consuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Fulvius Zonaras, L. Lentulus and Q. Flaccus. Eutropius, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The capitoll registers give to Lentulus, the surname Gaudens: and therefore in Cuspinians Kalender, they stand by the names of Candinus and Flaccus. As for the Sicilian registers, they leave them out cleane.

518

C. Licinius. T. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, C. Licinius and P. Cornelius. Zonaras, Pub. Lentulus and Licinius Varus. The capitoline writers, C. Licinius Varus, and P. Cornelius Lentulus Candinus. In like maner Censorinus; who reckoneth this for the 518 yeere after the cities foundation, following herein the computation of Varro, Cicero, and Plinie. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian registers, name them Claudius and Varus.

519

T. Manlius Torquatus. C. Atilius.

This yeere had for Consuls, as Cassiodorus saith, T. Manlius Torquatus and C. Atilius. The Sicilian records, shew Torquatus and Bulbus: but Eutropius, Orofius, and the capitoll tables shew, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Atilius Bulbus: unto Bulbus. The capitoll records put to the numeral note II. When T. Manlius Torquatus and C. Atilius Bulbus the second time were Cons. according to Verrius Flaccus, Eutropius, Orofius, and Cassiodorus, and that there was peace throughout all the empire of Rome, the temple of Ianus was shut the second time, as Plutarch sheweth in Numa; as Livie also, Velicius, Eutropius, and Orofius, doe testifie.

L. Postumius. Sp. Carvilius.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls this yeere L. Postumius and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian registers have Albinus and Ruga. Zonaras, Postumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius. The Capitoll writers have L. Postumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius Maximus. That Ruga was asurnameto the Carvili, appeareth out of Gellius, who maketh mention of Sp. Carvilius Ruga, who at this time was the first that divorced his wife.

Q. Fabius. M. Pomponius.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, Q. Fabius and M. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Matbo. The Capitoline writers have Qu. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, and M. Pomponius Matbo. Zonaras hath Qu. Fabius Max. and Manius Pomponius. The surname of Maximus, this Fabius tooke of his grandfather, and was not himselfe the first of that name, whatsoever Polybius writeth in his third booke. Verrucosus he was called besides of a wart upon his lip, as Plutarch witnesseth, and he that wrote the treatise of Famous men.

M. Lepidus. M. Poplicius.

Arcus Lepidus and M. Poplicius are reputed to be Consuls this yeere by Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers have Lepidus and Malleolus. Zonaras hath M. Malleolus and M. Aemilius. The Capitoll tables shew M. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Poplicius.

C. Papirius. M. Pomponius.

Next after this were created Consuls, C. Papirius and M. Pomponius according to Cassiodorus, Zonaras, and Dionysius in his second booke. The Sicilian registers shew Maso and Matbo. But the Capitoll records have C. Papirius Maso and M. Pomponius Matbo. Of C. Papirius, son of C. surnamed Maso, a Pontific or bishop, Livie speaketh in the yeer 540.

M. Aemilius. M. Iunius.

Zonaras and Cassiodorus exhibite unto us for Consuls, M. Aemilius and M. Iunius.

The Sicilian registers, Barbula and Pera. The Capitoll records, M. Aemilius Barbula & Mar. Iunius Pera.

L. Postumius. Cn. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus setteth downe L. Postumius and Cn. Fulvius as Consuls. The Sicilian records Albinus and Gentumalus. But those of the Capitoll, and Eutropius, present unto us L. Postumius Albinus & Cn. Fulvius Gentumalus. Polybius nameth Cn. Fulvius and A. Postumius.

Q. Fabius. I. I. Sp. Carvilius.

There are by Cassiodorus nominated for Consuls this yeere, Qu. Fabius Maximus the second time, and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian registers Maximus & Ruga. The Capitoll writers set also unto Carvilius Maximus the marke and numerall note of a double Consulship. Cicero in his booke entituled Cato, likewise in his second booke of Rhetoricall invention, maketh mention of these Consuls, and so doth Valerius in his chapter, discoursing of the kindnes and affectionate dutie of children to their parents.

P. Valerius. M. Atilius.

These are set downe by Cassiodorus for Cons. this yeere, P. Valerius and M. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, have Flaccus & Regulus. The Capitoll records represent P. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Atilius Regulus. Gellius writeth of them in his 4 booke and 3 chapter.

528

L. Apustius. M. Valerius.

Next after, Cassiodorus putteth L. Apustius and M. Valerius Consuls. The Sicilian tables Maximus and Apustius. The Capitoll monuments L. Apustius Fullo, & M. Valer. Mefala.

529

C. Atilius. L. Aemilius.

Immediately followed Consuls, C. Atilius and L. Aemilius, as Cassiodorus and Polybius doe witness: whome the Capitoll writers call, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Aemilius Papus.

Papir. The Sicilian registers, Regulus & Papir. Zonaras, Regulus and Aimilius. Orosius Consuls also Orosius maketh mention and Livie in his third booke and twentieth chapter, where untruly men read Paulus for Papir.

T. Manlius. Q. Fulvius. II.

The yeere following had Consuls T. Manlius and Q. Fulvius the second time, according to Cassiodorus and Polybius, and as Orosius saith, T. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Cuspinians tables, together with the Capitoline, have Torquatus the second time, and Flaccus likewise the second time, (chewing the furnants only of these Consuls).

531

C. Flaminius. P. Furius Philus.

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls, C. Flaminius & P. Furius. So doth Polybius. Zonaras nameth them Flaminius & Furius. Plutarch likewise in Marellus. The Sicilian tables name them Flaminius and Philus. But the Capitoll records, C. Flaminius, and Pub. Furius Philus.

532

M. Marcellus. Cn. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus nameth for the next Consuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius. Polybius, M. Claudius and Cn. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers Scipio and Marcellus. Zonaras, Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Scipio. Eutropius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. The Capitoll tables M. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus. This is that Marcellus, who was fivetimes Consull: and this is that Scipio, who afterwards with his brother Scipio was slain in Spaine by Asdrubali the Carthaginian.

533

P. Cornelius. M. Minutius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this yeeres Consuls, P. Cornelius and M. Minutius. So doth Zonaras. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Rufus. Eutropius hath P. Cornelius and M. Minutius Rufus. Cuspinians booke Asina and Rufus. Sigonius and Onuphrius both, doe thinke that this Publius Cornelius Scipio Asina was his sonne, who in the first Punicke war was twice Consull. And verily Livie, in the yeere 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius Asina, an honorable Senator, and who had been Consull.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras exhibite unto us for Consuls, L. Aemilius & C. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers Philus and Cuspinians booke Philus and Scevola.

M. Livius. L. Aemilius.

The Consuls next following were M. Livius and L. Aemilius, as Cassiodorus witnesseth, Cuspinians booke & the Greeke records Philus and Philus. Zonaras, M. Livius & Aemilius Paulus. Plinie maketh mention of these Consuls in the 29 booke and 1 chapter.

P. Cornelius Scipio. T. Sempronius Longus.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put downe for Consuls P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius Longus. Zonaras, Sempronius Longus and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Longus and Scipio. Livie, Eutropius, Probus, Orosius, and Pædianus, name them Pub. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus. Whiles these were Consuls, the second Punicke warre arose, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

Cn. Servilius Geminus. C. Flaminius.

Then followed Consuls, as Polybius, Cassiodorus, and Livie write, Cn. Servilius, together with C. Flaminius. But the two last named, as also the Sicilian registers, have given to Servilius the surname of Geminus. C. Flaminius now second time Consull, with like pride as heretofore, entered into his magistracie in the Ides of March, not at Rome but at Antimnum. The same man, in neglect and contempt of the Auspicia or signes of birds, at what time as hee made head and went against Anniball coming into Italie, fought a battell at the lake Thralymenus, where his armie was wholly defeated and himselfe lost his life: into whose place M. Atilius Regulus, who had ben Consull before, was substituted. Thus much out of Livie and Polybius.

C. Teren-

C. Terentius Varro. L. Aemilius Paulus.

Next to them Polybius bringeth in L. Aemilius and C. Terentius for Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Paulus and Varro. Plutarch in Paulus, Terentius Varro, and Aemilius Paulus. Livie, Cassiodorus, and others, C. Terentius Varro, and Lucius Aemilius Paulus. Goltzius noteth, that the father of C. Terentius Varro, was one Aulus, a thing by others passed over.

539

L. Posthumius Albinus. III.
M. Claudius Marcellus. II.
Q. Fabius Maximus. III.
T. Sempronius Gracchus.

Livie reporteth that the Consuls elect for this yeere, when M. Junius the Dictatour held the solemne assembly for the election, were Lucius Posthumius Albinus the third time, who as then ruled the province of Gaul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had bene maister of the horsemen: and that Posthumius before that hee entred into government, was by Anniball in France environned and slaine, in whose steed M. Marcellus was subrogated Consull now the second time: who upon information given by the Augurs, that his creation was not good, resigned: & commonly the Nobles gave out and said, That the gods were not well pleased, that two commoners were then first chosen Consuls: whereupon in the roume of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen Consull the third time. Thus write Livie and Plutarch. And for this cause it is that Cassiodorus, Orosius, and Eutropius doe put downe for this yeeres Consuls, T. Sempronius and Q. Fabius.

540

Q. Fabius. IIII. M. Claudius Marcellus. III.

Livie, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus, set out for Consuls this yeere, Quintus Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and Marcus Claudius Marcellus the third time. Moreover, Cicero oftentimes and Frontinus in his second booke of stratagemes, make mention of these Consuls.

Q. Fabius Max. son of Verrucosus.
T. Sempronius Gracchus. II.

Against this yeere were both the Consuls created in their absence, namely, Q. Fab. Max. the son of Verrucosus, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time: as Livie testifieth and Cassiodorus, together with the Sicilian registers. This Fabius had bene Pretour the former yeere: and Gracchus Consull two yeeres before. These Consuls Gellius nominateth out of Quadrigrarius, the second booke and second chapter. Likewise Cicero and Valerius.

542

Appius Claudius Pulcher.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus. III.

The Consuls created for this yeere by the Dictatour, were Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the third time, who then was maister of the horsemen, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who in his pretourship was L. depute in Sicilie, as Livie, Plutarch in Fabius, Cassiodorus, and Festus in his seventeenth booke doe witnesseth.

C. Sulpitius Galba. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Vpon the receit of certain letters, the Consuls agreed together, that Claudius should hold the election for magistrates and see it finished, whiles Fulvius remained still before Capua. Claudius created for Consuls, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and Publius Sulpitius sonne of Servius, and surnamed Galba, who before time had borne no state-office of the chaire. Thus writeth Livie. The same Consuls also Cassiodorus doth deliver. Orosius likewise and Festus in his seventeenth booke. The Sicilian records declare Galba and Centumalus. As for Serv. Sulpitius, he is named in his second Consulship, as it appeareth upon record in the Capitoll, the son of Serv. nephew of Publius surnamed Galba Maximus.

M. Valerius Maximus. II. M. Claudius Marcellus. IIII.

Livie, Sextus Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch, Florus, Eutropius, and Orosius, doe doe present for Consuls this yeere, Marcus Claudius Marcellus & M. Valerius Lavinius. Now this is Marcellus his fourth Consulship, as Plutarch and Livie write: but Cassiodorus saith, that hee was but the third time with M. Valerius Lavinius, leaving out that Consulship which he bare not through, because of the error in his creation: and yet is it one of the five that hee is reported to have borne. Livie in the nine and twentieth and thirtieth bookes, writeth that Marcus Valerius was twice Consull. In like manner, the booke of Cuspinian hath for this yeer, Marcellus the fourth time, and Lavinus the second time. And therefore Onuphrius supposeth that his first Consulship was in the yeere five hundred foure and thirtie: and his second, now. Of him Polybius and Cicero make mention.

Q. Fabius Maximus. V.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus. IIII.

THe Consuls for this yeere created, were Quintus Fabius the fift time, and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the fourth time, the same man who being Dictator, held the assembly for that election; as Livie and Cassiodorus doe witnesse. The Sicilian records set forth Fabius and Flaccus. Whiles these were Consuls, Cicero in his Oration against Rullus, saith that Capua was woen: and yet Livie hath reported it two yeeres before. Of these Consuls Valerius also, together with Plutarch, Eutropius, and Orosius have made mention.

546

M. Claudius Marcellus. V.
T. Quintius Crispinus.

IN the eleventh yeere of the Punicke warre, there entered into their Consulship, Marcus Marcellus the fift time (so yee reckon that Consulship which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quintius Crispinus. So saith Livie. Plutarch also nameth Marcellus the fift time and Crispinus. But Cassiodorus reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Crispinus, passing over that faultie Consulship of his. Moreover these Consuls are mentioned by Cicero, Valerius, Plinius the younger, Probus, Eutropius, and Orosius: who also report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambush by Anniball: in so much as Marcellus was presently slaine in the place, and Quintus fled fore wounded.

C. Claudius Nero.
M. Livius Salinator.

WHen the LL. of the Senate cast about to see whome they should create Consuls, behold, the most eminent and singular man above all others, was C. Claudius Nero: unto whom was joined as companion in government Marcus Livius, who many yeeres before, upon a Consulship that hee had borne, was by the judgement of the people condemned; and almost eight yeeres after his condemnation was by Marcus Marcellus, and Marcus Livius then Consuls, reduced into the cittie. In like manner, the Sicilian registers name for Consuls, Nero and Salinator. The capitoll records shew Caius Claudius Nero, with Marcus Livius Salinator.

548

Quintus Caelius Metellus.
L. Veturius Philo.

Livie, Cassiodorus, and the records of the capitoll, exhibit unto us for Consuls this yeere, Lucius Veturius Philo, and Quintus Caelius Metellus. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Philo. Over and besides, of these Consuls Cicero many a time and often, Valerius, Plutarch in Africanus, Appianus in Ibericus, Plinie in his 7 booke 43 chap. doe make mention.

549

P. Cornelius Scipio.
P. Licinius Crassus.

Livie Veturius Philo held the assembly for creation of magistrates, wherein all the Centuries in generall, with exceeding great favour nominated Publius Scipio for Consull, and to him was joined in government, P. Licinius Crassus, the supreme Pontific. Thus saith Livie. The Sicilian tables shew Scipio with Crassus. The capitoll records shew

P. Cor-

P. Cornelius Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, with P. Licinius Crassus the rich, of whom Cassiodorus likewise and Cicero in Brutus doe speake.

M. Cornelius Cethegus. P. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitoll records doe name for Consuls this yeere, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The Sicilian registers, Cethegus and Tuditanus, of whom Cicero in Brutus, Plutarch, Eutropius and Cassiodorus doe often times make mention. In this yeere P. Scipio Nasica, judged by the Senate the best man in the cittie, received dame Idea.

Cn. Servilius Capio. C. Servilius.

Livie and Cassiodorus together, with the Sicilian records and capitoll monuments, put unto us for Consuls, Cn. Servilius Capio and C. Servilius. Of which twaine Capio had bene Pretour in the yeere 548, and Servilius in 547. This yeere died Q. Fabius Max: and Anniball with a sad cheere & heave heart departed out of Italie into Africke by commaundement of certaine delegate embassadours, in the seventeenth yeere of the second Punicke warre.

Tib. Claudius Nero. M. Servilius Geminus.

Marcus Servilius Geminus, & Tib. Claudius Nero were Coss. his yeere according to Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitoll records, in which Servilius standeth surnamed Pulex Geminus. The Sicilian tables have Nero with Servilius. In these Consuls yeere, Anniball was in Africke by Scipio overthrowne, and a second peace made with the Carthaginians, as Polybius, Livie, Plutarch, Appian, and Eutropius do report.

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus. P. Aelius Patus.

Against this yeere were created Consuls, as Livie writeth, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Patus: So saith Cassiodorus also and Plinie in his eighteenth booke and eighteenth chapter. In a broken peece of marble in the Capitoll, were find Lentulus and P. Aelius: in the Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Patus. These two were Pretours both in the yeere 550.

P. Sulpitius Galba. C. Aurelius Cotta.

Livie and Cassiodorus put downe for Consuls, P. Sulpitius Galba, & C. Aurelius Cotta. This P. Sulpitius in the yeere 542 was first Consull: and C. Cotta two yeeres before, Pretour. These same Consuls are to bee scene in the capitoll tables, but Galba and Cotta in the Sicilian.

L. Cornelius Lentulus. P. Villius Tappulus.

This yeere had for Consuls, L. Cornelius and P. Villius, as Cassiodorus writeth: but according to Livie & the capitoll monuments, Lentulus and Tappulus: after the Sicilian records, L. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus. Of P. Villius Consull, Plutarch maketh mention in Quintius.

T. Quintius Flaminus. Sext. Aelius Patus.

Livie, Cassiodorus, the capitoll records, together with Plutarch in Quintius, report unto us for Consuls this yeere, T. Quintius Flaminus and Sext. Aelius Patus. The Sicilian tables, Flaminus and Patus. Plinie in his booke of famous men, saith (but not without some error) that this Flaminus was the sonne of that C. Flaminus who was slaine at Thrasymenus. Whereas in deed this man was descended of the noble Patrician house of the Quintij, the other of the familie of Flaminij, no better than commoners. Now this Sext. Aelius Patus is the man of whom Cicero giveth this report out of the Poet Ennius:

This Sextus Aelius in records, Caius surnam'd yee see.
A worthy knight for wisdomerare, a discrete man was hee.

And therefore in the capitoll tables he is called Patus Caius.

C. Cor-

C. Cornelius Cethegus. Q. Minutius Regius

IN this yeere Caius Cornelius Cethegus, and Q. Minutius were Consuls, after Livie, Cassiodorus, & the capitol marbles. Their surnames onely appeare in the Sicilian registers. And Cicero speaketh of them in Brutus.

558

L. Furius Purpureo. M. Claudius Marcellus.

THis yeere had for Consuls, L. Furius Purpureo, and M. Claudius Marcellus, according to Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records. The Sicilian annales deliver unto us Porphyreo and Marcellus.

559

M. Porcius Cato. L. Valerius Flaccus.

Marcus Porcius Cato & L. Valerius are ranged Consuls this yeere, by Verrius Flaccus, Cicero in many places, Livie, Plutarch, Plinie, Valerius, Probus, Eutropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus.

560

P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. II. T. Sempronius Longinus.

Livie, Cassiodorus, the monuments both of the capitol and Sicilie, match Consuls together this yeere, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the second time, and T. Sempronius Longus. Of them Cicero maketh mention in the oration of Cornelius accused of felonie, as appeareth in Pædianus.

L. Cornelius Merula. Q. Minutius Thermus.

Livie, Cassiodorus, & the capitol authors, write that the Consuls chosen to succeed in this yeere, were L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The said surnames are found in the Sicilian records. Probus speaketh of them in Anniball, and Frontius in his booke of stratagemes.

562

L. Quintius Flaminius. Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.

Livie, Quintius Flaminius, and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus were this yeeres Consuls, as Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records testifie. The Sicilian registers also shewe their surnames.

M. Atilius Glabrio. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

THe Consuls created for this yeere, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Atilius Glabrio, sonne of Cn. as testifie Livie, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, Plutarch in Quintius, and Appian in his Syriack historie. In the Sicilian registers, named they are Glabrio and Nasica. In these Consuls yeere the same authours report, that the war against Antiochus king of Syria, and against the Ætoliens, was proclaimed: which in the capitol monuments, in Paterculus, and Macrobius, is called the Antiochian, but by Florus and Plinie the younger in Cato, the Syrian warre. This was the 562 yeere from the cities foundation, as Macrobius writeth in his first booke of Saturnals.

Cassiodorus, Livius, and the capitol tables put downe for Consuls this yeere, L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Laelius. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Laelius. The same men Gellius in his sixteenth booke and fourth chapter nameth C. Laelius sonne of C. and L. Scipio, sonne of P. To Laelius Cassiodore onely addeth the surname Africanus. This L. Scipio surnamed Asiaticus, was brother to Africanus.

565

C. Manlius Vulso. M. Fulvius Nobilior.

Cneus Manlius Vulso, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, are nominated Consuls for this yeere by Livie, Cassiodore, and the tables both of the capitol and Sicilie. Manlius was Pretor in the yeere 557 and Fulvius anno 560.

566

C. Livius Salinator. M. Valerius Messala.

THe Consuls next following, were M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, as Livie, and Cassiodorus testifie, together with the Sicilian and capitol tables.

M. Aimi-

M. Aemilius Lepidus. C. Flaminius.

THe next Consuls, were M. Aemilius Lepidus & C. Flaminius, as witness Livie, Cassiodorus, Zonaras, Strabo in his fifth booke, the Sicilian & capitol tables. Of them Valerius maketh mention in his sixth booke. This is that M. Lepidus who was the Arch-bishop, twice Consull, Censor, and President of the Senate sixe times chosen by the Censours. And this is that C. Flaminius, who afterward by Cato the Censor was displaced out of the Senate and disrobed.

Sp. Posthumius Albinus. Q. Martius Philippus.

Livie, Cassiodorus, Eutropius, and the capitol tables report Consuls for this yeere, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Philippus. The Sicilian Registers name them barely, Albinus and Philippus. Valerius maketh mention of them in his sixth booke & third chapter. Likewise Plinie in his 33 booke & tenth chapter.

569

App. Claudius Pulcher. M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

For this yeeres Consuls were Appius Claudius Pulcher, and M. Sempronius Tuditanus, as Livie, Cassiodorus and the capitol records do testifie. They stand in the Sicilian records by the names of Pulcher and Tuditanus.

P. Claudius Pulcher. L. Porcius Cicerinus.

THe Consuls that followed for this yeere, were L. Porcius Cicerinus & P. Claudius Pulcher: witness Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables. Pulcher and Cicerinus they be called in the Sicilian records.

Q. Fabius Laber. M. Claudius Marcellus.

Against this yeere were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus & Q. Fabius Laber, according to Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitol marble stones. Their surnames be found also in the Sicilian tables. Whiles these were Consuls, Atticus wrote that Anniball died, as Probus maketh report in Anniball.

L. Æmylius Paulus. Cn. Bæbius Tamphilus.

Cneus Bæbius Tamphilus & L. Æmylius Paulus were created Consuls for this yeere, as Livie, Cassiodorus, the capitol, yea & the Sicilian tables do testifie, although these last have regard only of their surnames. This L. Æmylius is the sonne of that L. Æmylius, who was slaine at Cannæ, as Plutarch and Velleius doe witness.

P. Cornelius Cethegus. M. Bæbius Tamphilus.

Publius Cornelius Cethegus and M. Bæbius Tamphilus, succeeded Consuls this yeere, after Livie, Cassiodore and the capitol tables. Cethegus and Tamphilus they be called in the Sicilian records. Of P. Cornelius and M. Bæbius Consuls, Plutarch made mention in Numa. Of P. Cornelius and M. Bæbius Tamphilus Valerius speaketh in his first booke & first chapter. Of P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Bæbius Tamphilus in 11 booke & first chapter. But Plinie in his 13 booke and 13 chapter calleth the one P. Cornelius Cethegus, son of Lucius: and the other M. Bæbius son of Q. surnamed Tamphilus.

574

A. Posthumius Albinus. C. Calpurnius Piso.

Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments exhibit unto us for this yeeres Consuls, A. Posthumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso. The Sicilian tables, Albinus and Piso. Piso was Pretour in the yeere 567. And Albinus anno. 568. But when as a pestilence had reigned now three yeeres, so as it dispeopled the citie of Rome and all Italie, it hapned that C. Calpurnius died, not without suspicion that he was murdered by Quarta Hostilia: in whose rounge Q. Fulvius Flaccus, his father in law or mothers husband, was declared Consull.

575

L. Manlius Acidinus. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Livie, Cassiodore, and the capitol records shew for Consuls this yeere, L. Manlius Acidinus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The Sicilian tables, Acidinus with Flaccus. Cicero maketh mention of Acidinus a Consull, in his second booke of a perfect oratour. Also observed it is in the capitoll monuments, that these Consuls were german brethren: & the same hath Vellejus in his second booke reported. And thereby it commeth to passe, that in the capitoll tables L. Manlius Acidinus, is surnamed also Fulvius after the manner of those that are adopted.

T t t t i j in

M. Iunius Brutus. A. Manlius Vulso.

Ext Consuls created, were M. Iunius Brutus and A. Manlius Vulso: as Livie, Cassiodore, and the capitoll records doe testifie. Brutus and Vulso they bee named in the Sicilian monuments. This Brutus was Pretour in the yeere 562, and Vulso in 571.

C. Claudius Pulcher. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus.

C. Claudius Pulcher and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, are matched Consuls this yeere by Verrius Flaccus, Livie, & Cassiodorus. Of this Tib. Gracchus Cicero speaketh in his first booke of divination, and Frontinus in his first of stratagemes.

C. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus. Q. Petilius Spurinus. C. Valerius Lavinius.

Livie, Cassiodore, and the capitoll records exhibit unto us for Consuls, Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petilius Spurinus. The Sicilian registers, Scipio and Petilius. But when Scipio returning out of the mount Albanus, fell into a fit of Apoplexie, and so into a dead palsey, whereupon hee went to the bath at Cumes, where, by reason that his disease grew upon him, he departed this life; Q. Petilius the other Consull, created for his companion to enter presently upon the government, C. Valerius Lavinius. Thus saith Livie.

579

P. Mutius Scævola. M. Aemilius Lepidus. II.

Orosius putteth downe for Consuls Lepidus and Mutius, Cassiodorus and Obsequens, M. Lepidus and P. Mutius. The Sicilian tables, Lepidus and Scævola. The capitoll monuments, P. Mutius Scævola and M. Aemilius Lepidus. II. The election of the Consuls this yeere is lost in Livie. Cicero likewise writeth in his discourse of provinces; Valerius also in his sixt booke and sixt chapter, that this M. Aemilius Lepidus was twice Consull.

Sp. Posthumius Albinus. Q. Mutius Scævola.

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls, Sp. Posthumius and Q. Mutius. The capitoll records, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Mutius Scævola. Cuspinians booke hath Paulus & Scævola. Plinie maketh mention of these in his second booke and 31 chapter. The election of the Consuls this yeere is lost in Livie.

581

L. Posthumius Albinus. M. Popilius Lenas.

The Coss. for this yeere created, were L. Posthumius Albinus & M. Popilius Lenas, as Livie, Cassiodorus, & the capitoll monuments doe testifie. Albinus and Lenas are put downe in the Sicilian records. Whiles these were Consuls, the feast Floralia was instituted first, as Ovid sheweth in his sixt booke of his kalender.

C. Popilius Lenas. P. Aelius Ligur.

This yeere had for Consuls, C. Popilius Lenas, & P. Aelius Ligur, as Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitoll records doe testifie. The Sicilian registers name them Lenas & Aelius. To this day had no Coss. in one yeere bin matched together, both commoners: and this was the first time, that both Consuls were created out of the commons, as is observed in the capitoll monuments. After this, you shall never find the Consuls both Patritij: commoners ye shall have them both twaine, many a time and often: but most of all, a Commoner and a Patrician, one with another.

P. Licinius Crassus. C. Cassius Longinus.

The Consuls next ensuing for this yeere, were P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus, as it appereth in Livie, Cassiodorus, Orosius, and the capitoll tables: For in the Sicilian records, they are named no otherwise than Crassus and Longinus. Of the very same Consuls Plinie maketh mention in his seventh booke. Gellius also in his ninth booke & fourth chapter. Whiles these were Consuls, the people of Rome began warre against Perseus king of the Mace-Macedonians, son of Philip: which Florus and Eutropius, together with Orosius, call the second Macedonian war: whereof Livie and Plutarch write more at large.

A. Hostilius Mancinus. A. Atilius Serranus.

Cassiodorus setteth next after for Consuls, A. Hostilius Mancinus, & C. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, Mancinus and Serranus. The capitoll monuments, Au. Atilius Mancinus, and Au. Atilius Serranus. As well the election of these Consuls as their acts, are missing in the Annales of Livie.

Q. Martius Philippus. II. Cn. Servilius Capio.

Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitoll tables match together in the Consulship of this yeere Q. Martius Philippus the second time, and Cn. Servilius Capio. The Sicilian catalogue hath barely Philp and Capio. Cicero in his bookes entituled Brutus and Cato, writeth that Ennius the Poet died in their Consulare.

L. Aemilius Paulus. II. C. Licinius Crassus.

The Consuls that next succeeded were L. Aemilius Paulus the second time (seventeen yeeres after his first Consulship) and Caius Licinius Crassus: witness Livie, Cassiodorus, and the capitoll monuments. In like manner they are named in the Sicilian registers Paulus and Crassus. As touching this second Consulare of L. Paulus, Plutarch, Velleius, Orosius, Eutropius, Florus, and Iustinus in his 33 booke doe write. Plutarch addeth thus much & saith, That Paulus was threescore yeeres of age, when he was chosen Consull the second time.

Q. Aelius Paetus. M. Iunius.

Livie bringeth in for Consuls next after, Q. Aelius and M. Iunius. The Sicilian records Paetus and Pannus. Obsequens and Cassiodorus Q. Aelius Paetus, and M. Iunius Pannus. Cicero likewise in Brutus speaketh of Mar. Iunius Pannus, Consull with Q. Aelius. Now from this yeere forward, we want the compleat storie penned by Livie.

588

M. Marcellus. C. Sulpicius.

Livie and the capitoll monuments shew for this yeeres Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Sulpicius Gallus. Obsequens, and the title prefixed before the comedie Andria in Terence, exhibit Mar. Marcellus and C. Sulpicius. This is that Marcellus, who after he had bene thrice Consull, perished in the sea. Nephew he was of that Mar. Marcellus, who had been five times Consull, as Pædianus reporteth. Of these Consuls, Iustine, Plinie in his second booke, and many other have made mention.

Cn. Octavius. T. Manlius.

Cassiodorus & Obsequens inferre Consuls this yeere, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius. The Sicilian tables, Octavius and Torquatus. The capitoll stones, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius Torquatus. Mention there is made of these Consuls in the title set before Hecyra in Terence. Cicero in his first booke of Finall ends, & likewise in many other places, speaketh of T. Torquatus, Consull with Cn. Octavius.

590

A. Manlius. Q. Cassius.

Cassiodorus matcheth together Consuls in this yeere, A. Manlius and Q. Cassius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Torquatus and Longinus. The capitoll records, A. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Cassius Longinus, who died in his Consulship. These also had been companions together in their Pretourship, anno 586, as Livie beareth witness.

591

Tib. Sempronius. M. Iuventius.

Cassiodorus saith, that the Consuls this yeere were T. Sempronius and M. Iuventius. Obsequens nameth them, Tib. Gracchus, and M. Iuventius. The capitoll monuments shew T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, and M. Iuventius Thalna. In the Sicilian registers, Dolabella & Thalna, but not well as it is to be doubted. Cicero, Valerius, and Plutarch have made mention of Tiberius Gracchus twice Consull. And that M. Iuventius died whiles he was Consull, Plinie in his seventh booke, and Valerius also doe report.

P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. C. Marcius.

Cicero in his first & second booke of the nature of gods, Verrius Flaccus, Obsequens & Cassiodorus Cassiodorus, report for Consuls Pub. Cornelius Scipio Nasica and C. Martius Figulus. But for that there was an error committed in their creation, and thereupon they resigned up their place, as the foresaid authours witnesseth, together with Valerius, Plutarch, and Plinie: Cornelius Lentulus, and Cn. Domitius Aemobarbus, entred in their stead.

M. Messala. C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, M. Messala and C. Fannius. The Sicilian catalogue Messala and Strabo. The capitoll records, and the title before Phormio in Terence represent unto us, M. Valerius Messala, & Caius Fannius Strabo. Of these Consuls Suetonius maketh mention in his book of excellent Rhetoricians. Likewise Cicero in Brutus, Plinie in his ninth booke and fiftieth chapter, and Gellius in his second booke.

L. Anicius. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Cassiodorus and the title set before the Comedie Adelphi in Terence avouch for Coss. L. Anicius and M. Cornelius. The Sicilian and capitoll records put surnames unto them, Gallus and Cethegus. Of Anicius the Consull, Cicero speaketh in Brutus: and of Cethegus, the sixe and fortieth Epitome or breviarie of Florus. In their yeere, it is for certaine held, that L. Paulus who conquered Perseus, died.

595

Cn. Cornelius Dolabella. M. Fulvius.

The yeere next following had Consuls, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers shew Dolabella and Fulvius. The capitoll monuments, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and Mar. Fulvius Nobilior. The same is to be seene in the life of Terence the poet, for there it is written, that in their yeere he died.

M. Aemilius. C. Popilius.

The Consuls next succeeding, were Marcus Aemilius and C. Popilius, as Cassiodorus saith. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Lenas. The capitoll records have M. A- mylius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lenas the second time. Of the same, Censorinus maketh mention in his chapter of distinction of ages.

Sex. Julius. L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus reporteth, that the next Consuls were Sex. Julius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian and capitoll tables yeeld surnames unto them, Cesar to Julius, and Orestes to Aurelius. Plinie writeth of them in his 33 booke.

598

Obsequens and Cassiodorus record for this yeeres Consuls L. Lentulus and C. Martius. The Sicilian catalogue Lentulus and Figulus. The capitoll monuments, L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, and C. Martius Figulus the second time. Cicero in Brutus speaketh of them both. And as touching Figulus twice Consull, Valerius writeth in his chapter of Wrath.

599

P. Scipio Nasica. M. Claudius.

Publius Scipio and M. Claudius are by Cassiodorus set down for Coss. The Sicilian registers have Nasica and Marcellus. The capitoll records, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica the second time, and M. Claudius Marcellus likewise the second time. Pædianus writeth, that this Marcellus was thrice Consull. And that Pub. Scipio Nasica, surnamed also Corculum, was twice Consull and Censor besides, Cicero writeth in his Brutus.

600

L. Postumius. Q. Opimius.

This yeere had Consuls, L. Postumius and Qu. Opimius, as Cassiodorus & Obsequens doe witnesseth. The Sicilian tables shew Opimius and Albinus. But the capitoll records, Q. Opimius, and L. Postumius Albinus. Mention there is made of this Qu. Opimius, Consull, by Cicero in his Brutus; also in the Epitome of the seven and fortieth booke. Moreover, that Postumius died in his magistracie, besides Verrius Flaccus, Obsequens also sheweth: in whose stead Manius Acilius Glabrio was chosen.

Q. Fulvius.

Q. Fulvius. T. Annius.

The Consuls next following, as Cassiodorus writeth, were Qu. Fulvius and T. Annius. In the capitoll fragments they are named Nobilior and T. Annius. In the Sicilian registers, Nobilior and Luscus. Cicero in his Brutus saith, that Q. Nobilior sonne of Marcus, and T. Annius Luscus were Consuls. The Greeke records and Culpsinians booke shew Nobilior & Luscus.

602

M. Marcellus. L. Valerius.

This yeere had for Consuls, M. Marcellus & L. Valerius as Cassiodorus witnesseth. The Sicilian catalogue representeth Marcellus and Flaccus. Obsequens exhibiteth unto us M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus. This Marcellus was thrice Consull, as Pædian saith upon the Oracion for Seaurus, & Cicero in his booke of divination and destiny.

603

L. Licinius Lucullus. A. Postumius Albinus.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, L. Lucullus and A. Postumius. The Sicilian tables, Lucullus & Albinus. The broken marbles of the capitoll, Lucullus and A. Postumius sonne of Aulus. Orosius and the Epitome 48. shew L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Postumius Albinus. Cicero in his Brutus, and Lucullus both maketh mention of the same.

604

T. Quintius. M. Acilius.

This yeere had for Consuls, L. Quintius and M. Acilius, as Cassiodorus testifieth, whom Plinie in his 7. booke and 36 chap. calleth Caius Quintius and M. Acilius. Cicero in his book Cato, and the 12 booke of his epistles to Atticus nameth T. Flaminius and M. Acilius, & saith that they were created Consuls in the 19 yeere after the death of Ennius. The Sicilian tables have Flaminius and Balbus. The capitoll fragments, Flaminius and M. Acilius Balbus.

605

L. Martius. M. Manilius.

Cassiodorus avoucheth for the Consuls of this yeere, L. Martius and M. Manilius likewise the 49 Epitome. Cicero in Lucullus maketh mention of Censorinus and M. Manilius: of Censorinus and Manilius in his twelfth booke of epistles to Atticus. The same Consuls, Appianus in Libyca nameth L. Manius Censorinus & M. Manilius. In like sort Censorinus in his treatise of Nativitie or Birthday. The Sicilian tables have Censorinus and Manilius. The capitoll fragments shew Censorinus and M. Manilius, sonne of Publius, nephew of Pub. Whiles these were Consuls, there arose a third war betwene the State of Rome and the Carthaginians, as Florus in the 49 Epitome, besides Verrius Flaccus doe testifie: likewise Solinus, but that hee saith with Verrius Flaccus, that it was the yeere 64. Cicero also in his eleventh Philippicke, and lastly Eutropius, with Orosius.

Sp. Postumius. L. Piso.

Then were Consuls created, Sp. Postumius and L. Piso, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In the Capitoll fragments they are named Albinus Magnus, and L. Calpurnius, sonne of Caius, nephew of Caius, surnamed Piso Calpurnius. In Culpsinians kalender, Magnus and Censorinus; in the Sicilian catalogue Albinus and Piso. As for Magnus and Albinus, they be the surnames of Postumius like as Calpurnius and Piso, of Calpurnius. In this yeere the people of Rome entred into armes against Andriscus, otherwise rearm'd Pseudo-philippus, which they call the third Macedonian warre, after Florus and Eutropius.

P. Africanus. C. Livius.

Obsequens and Cassiodorus set fourth for Consuls this yeere P. Africanus and Caius Livius. In the Sicilian catalogue they are registred Scipio and Drusus: in the capitoll fragments Africanus Aemilianus, and C. Livius the one sonne of M. Aemilianus, nephew of Marcus, the other surnamed Drusus. This Pub. Cornelius was the naturall sonne of that Paulus that vanquished Perseus king of the Macedonians, and adopted by P. Cornelius the sonne of Scipio Africanus. Whereupon he was called Pub. Cornelius, sonne of Publius, & Aemilianus, as Velleius and others doe witnesseth.

His

His two last surnames are in the capitoll records, out of which, the complete name of M. L. vius Drusus, with his addition, was framed. Of these Consuls Cicero speaketh after: likewise Valerius, Paternulus, Appian, Plutarch, Florus, both Plinies, Eutropius and Orofius,

C. Cornelius. L. Mummius.

NExt Consuls following, were Cn. Cornelius and L. Mummius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus: and according to Orofius, Velleius, Censorinus, and Cicero in the thirteenth booke of epistles to Atticus, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius they are named. In the Sicilian registers: Lentulus and Mummius. In the fragments of the capitoll, Lentulus and L. Mummius, nephew of Lucius. Lu. Mummius in this magistracie acquired the surname of Achaicus, upon a victorie achieved by him in Achæa, as Plutarch in Marius, and Velleius doe testifie.

Q. Fabius Maximus. L. Hostilius.

Cassiodorus this yeere delivereth unto us for Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus, together with L. Hostilius. Cicero in Lælius, and Plinie in his five and thirtieth booke and fourth chapter, nameth them Qn. Maximus, brother of Scipio, and L. Mancinus. Of this Q. Fabius Maximus Aemilianus, Valerius writeth in his second booke and first chapter. This Q. Fabius was the sonne of P. Aemilius, adopted by Q. Fab. Max. the sonne of Verrucosius, as Appianus writeth in Hispanensis: and therefore in the fragment of a capitoll table there is to be seen the second surname Aemilianus. Plinie was deceived, who in his one & thirtieth booke and eleventh chapter calleth him Qn. Allobrogicus, brother of Scipio, who was the sonne of this Fabius.

Ser. Galba. L. Aurelius.

This yeere had for Consuls, Ser. Galba and Lu. Aurelius, according to Cassiodorus; those Valerius in his sixt booke nameth Ser. Sulpitius Galba, and Lu. Aurelius Cotta, whom the Sicilian catalogue sheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the capitoll fragments have Galba and L. Valerius Cotta. This is that Sulpitius Galba, who being Pretor, as Suetonius writeth, stirred up the war before against Viriatius, for hee was a vehement Oratour, of whom Cicero speaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, hee it was whom afterwards being accused by Africanus, Qn. Metellus Macedonicus defended. Cicero in Brutus, for Murena and against Verres, maketh mention of him. Likewise Frontinus of them both, in his first booke of water-conduits.

App. Claudius. Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus nameth for this yeeres Consuls Appius Claudius and Q. Metellus, Orofius, App. Claudius and Qn. Cæcilius Metellus. The Sicilian registers have Claudius and Metellus. The capitoll fragments shew Pulcher and Q. Cæcilius Macedonicus. Of the same, Frontinus speaketh in his booke of water-conduits, and Valerius in his seventh booke. Now this Metellus is he who being Pretor, subdued the Macedonians and Achaicans, whereupon he was surnamed Macedonicus: whom Plinie 7 booke sheweth to be the son of Lu. and nephew of Quin.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, Lu. Metellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records Metellus and Maximus. Orofius, L. Cæcilius Metellus and Q. Fabius Maximus Seruilius. In like manner the capitoll fragments Calvus & Servilianus. This Servilianus is the brother german of Quintus Servilius Cæpio, the Consull two yeeres after (as witnesseth Appian) and the adopted son of Q. Fabius Aemilianus; for they were both adopted by Q. Fabius Max. the son of Verrucosius, the one out of the house Aemilia, the other of Servilia. L. Metellus is the brother of Q. Metellus Macedonicus, as witnesseth Valerius in his treatise of Witnesses.

Cneus Cæpio and Q. Pompeius are recounted for Consuls by Cassiodorus. Velleius in his second booke saith thus: Whether there were two or three houses of the Pompeii, the first of that name was Consull with Cn. Seruilius. Of this Q. Pompeius, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes, writing that hee was of base and obscure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witnesses nesses nameth Aufidius, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in steed of Au. F. i. the sonne of Aulus. In the same sort Appianus in Hispanensis nameth him Qn. Pompeius Aulus for A. Filius. Cicero in his Orations against Verres, and in that for Fonteius, Valerius also in his chapter of Witnesses, sheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servilij Capiones.

Q. Cæpio. C. Lælius.

After this were Consuls made, Qn. Cæpio and C. Lælius, my authours are Cassiodorus and Obsequens, together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatise of Water-conduits. This Lælius as Cicero in his eleventh Philippicke, and Velleius doe report, was the sonne of Lælius the Consull, anno 564, whom as Cicero in his second booke of Duties and in Lælius, was the first that was surnamed Wife, whereof Plutarch in Gracchi yeeldeth a reason.

Cn. Pifo. M. Popilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this yeeres Consuls, Cn. Pifo with M. Popilius, Appianus and the Epitomist have M. Popilius Lenas; but they be named M. Popilius Lenas and L. Calpurnius by Valerius in his first booke, writing thus: That Cornelius Hispanus, lord cheefe justice for strangers, when M. Popilius Lenas & L. Calpurnius were Consuls, by an edict commanded all the Chaldean [Astrologers] to depart out of Rome and Italie within ten daies next ensuing.

P. Scipio. D. Brutus.

Publius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this yeeres Coss. by Cassiodorus. Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Nasica (surnamed Serapion in mockerie by C. Curtius a Trib. of the Com.) & D. Junius Brutus Coss. levied and mustered soldiours, &c. This Scipio was sonne of that Nasica who was surnamed Corcalium, and twise was he Consull and Censor also, nephew to that Nasica, who by the Senate was deemed the best man in the citie, and father to him that warred upon Iugurtha, as Velleius saith. This Decius Brutus, Cicero in his Brutus calleth the sonne of Marcus, who bare the Consullship in the yeere five hundred ninetie seven, and in the capitoll tables is called Pennus. Moreover, of these Consuls Cicero speaketh very oft. Valerius also in his 3 booke, chap. 7. 5 booke, chap. 3. 9 booke, chap. 15: Likewise Plinie in his 21 booke, and lastly Frontinus.

M. Aemilius. C. Hostilius Mancinus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens match together in the Consullship this yeere, M. Aemilius and C. Hostilius Mancinus. The Sicilian registers Lepidus and Mancinus. Orofius & Appian, M. Aemilius Lepidus and C. Hostilius Mancinus. Of this Consull Mancinus there remaine yet some tokens to be seene in broken marbles of the capitoll. Cicero maketh mention oftentimes of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brutus. Likewise Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Plinie in his treatise of Famous men.

P. Furius. Sex. Atilius Serranus.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, P. Furius and Sex. Atilius Serranus. Cicero in his third booke of Duties, L. Furius and Sex. Atilius. Obsequens, L. Furius & Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian registers Philus and Serranus. Of this Furius, Cicero writeth thus in his Brutus; Lu. Furius Philus, was reputed for a man of very good language, and to have spoken more learnedly than others. In the capitoll fragments there appeareth yet some shew of Serranus the Consull.

Ser. Fulvius. C. Calpurnius.

The next Consuls are set downe by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, Ser. Fulvius and Q. Calpurnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flaccus and Pifo. Orofius nameth Servius Fulvius Flaccus and Qn. Calpurnius Pifo. The capitoll fragments shew Pifo; as for Fulvius Flaccus the Consull, mention there is made of him in the Epitome 36: Appian also in his Illyrica speak of him, and in Hispanensis of Calpurnius Pifo.

620

P. Africanus. C. Fulvius Flaccus.

The yeere following had P. Africanus and C. Fulvius Flaccus for Coss. as it is written in Cassi-

Cassiodorus and Obsequens. But Scipio and Flaccus, in the Sicilian catalogue. The same Flaccus the Capitoll fragments doe shew. Of this C. Fulvius, mention there is made also in the 36 Epitome; and of Africanus wife Consul, by Appian in Hispanensis, by Orosius, Florus, and Valerius in his eight booke.

P. Mucius. L. Calpurnius.

His yeere had Consuls, P. Mucius, and Lu. Calpurnius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers shew Scevola and Calpurnius. Velleius nameth P. Mucius Scevola and L. Calpurnius. Of these Consuls Pædianus upon the Orations against Verres, maketh mention in these words: Scevola a right learned man in the lawes was Consul with L. P. so, that yeer wherein Tab. Gracchus was killed. In the broken marbles of the capitoll he standeth by the name of L. Calpurnius P. so, surnamed also Frugi, & that truly. For Cicero in one Oration against Verres and in another for Fonteius writeth, that he was the first of the Pisones, called Frugi. This man, when he was Tribune or Provost of the Commons, made a law against the extortion of magistrates, when Martius & Manilius were Consuls: he wrote also the annals of Rome, as Cicero testifieth in his booke Brutus.

P. Popilius. P. Rupilius.

Against this yeere were Consuls created, as Cassiodorus writeth, P. Popilius and P. Rupilius: after the Sicilian records Lenus and Rupilius. Cicero maketh mention of them in his thirteenth booke of epistles to Atticus, and against Verres. Also in the capitoll fragments we read of P. Popilius, son of Caius, and P. Rupilius sonne of P. and nephew of Publius. Velleius in his second booke, nameth the Consuls Rupilius and Popilius. Cicero in Lælius speaketh of Rupilius and Lenus. And of P. Rupilius there is mention made in the epitome or breuiarie, 39.

623

P. Crassus. L. Valerius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls this yeere, Pub. Crassus and Lu. Valerius. Crassus and Flaccus the Sicilian catalogue. L. Valerius Flaccus and Pub. Licinius Crassus, according to Cicero in his eleventh Philippicke against An-tonic. Of this Consul Pub. Licinius Crassus, all they have spoken, who wrote of the warre of Aristonicus. This P. Crassus surnamed Dives, by Cicero in his bookes of a perfect Orator, and in Brutus is called the brother of Scevola: whereupon Velleius in his second booke nameth him Mutianus, betokening thereby that hee was adopted out of the house of Mutij into the familie of the Crassi. This man Gellius writeth in his first booke and three and twentieth chapter, to have bene of all others the richest man, the noblest personage, and the most eloquent Orator, the deepest lawyer, and the supreme bishop withall.

C. Claudius. M. Perpenna.

Appius Claudius and M. Perpenna are matched in the Consulate together this yeere by Obsequens and Cassiodorus. Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, shew Lentulus and Perpenna. This Claudius haply was adopted into the familie of the Cornely. Moreover Cicero in his third booke of Lawes, and in the Oration for Plancius, calleth this man C. Claudius. This also is confirmed by an old table of stone commonly knowne, wherein is to be seen this inscription, C. Claudio and M. Perpenna Coss. Which evidence, Sigonius and Onuphrius following, named him C. Claudius and not Appius. Of this M. Perpenna as many as wrote the warre of Aristonicus, have made mention, and namely, Valerius in his 3 booke and 4 chap. Velleius, Strabo, Orosius, & Eutropius.

C. Sempronius. M. Aquilius.

This yeere had Consuls, M. Aquilius and C. Sempronius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. But Aquilius and Tuditanus according to the Sicilian registers. C. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Aquilius, after Orosius. Cicero speaketh of them in his booke of the nature of gods, and to his brother, Quintus. Paterculus also in his second booke. Strabo in his 14 booke. Appian in his first booke. And both of them are taken out of the triumph records in the capitoll.

Cn. Octavius. T. Annius.

Next followed as Consuls Cn. Octavius and T. Annius, as Cassiodorus testifieth and none

631

Q. Cecilius. T. Quintius.

none but he. For Cuspinians booke and the Sicilian catalogue have Octavius and Rufus. Plutarch also writeth, that one T. Annius contended with Tib. Gracchus in a sedition. As for this Cn. Octavius, son he was to that Cneus who was Consul in the yeere five hundred eightie nine.

Cassiodorus nameth for this yeeres Consuls, L. Cassius and L. Cinna. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cinna. Cuspinians booke set out Rulla, corruptly for Ravilla, and Cinna. This L. Cassius was his sonne who bare the Consulship in the yeer five hundred & ninetie, and he was afterwards Cenfor in the yeere 629 surnamed Ravilla by Frontinus.

628

M. Aemilius. L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus & Obsequens reckon for Coss. this yeere, Mar. Aemilius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Orestes. Censorinus hath M. Aemilius Lepidus, and L. Aurelius Orestes. Cicero in Brutus, Mar. Lepidus, and L. Orestes.

629

M. Plautius. M. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens avouch Consuls this yeere, M. Plautius and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers, Hypseus & Flaccus. Orosius and Frontinus in his treatise of Water-conduits, M. Plautius Hypseus and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. Valerius also in his discourse of Pride maketh mention of them.

C. Cassius Longinus. C. Sextius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens report, that the Consuls following were C. Cassius Longinus, & C. Sextius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Longinus and Calvinus. Velleius writeth, that the colonie Fabrateria was planted by Cassius and Calvinus. Cicero in Brutus speaketh of C. Sextius Calvinus. Eutropius declareth for Consuls, C. Cassius Longinus, and Sextius Domitius Calvinus, not without suspicion of a fault or error.

Cn. Domitius. C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens joine in fellowship of the Consulate this yeere, Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Aenobarbus and Fannius. Cicero writeth of them in his Brutus, and Plinie in his second booke and two and thirtieth chapter. Three moones (qd: he) appeared when Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius were Coss. which most men called the night-stars.

633

L. Opimius. Q. Maximus.

This yeere had for Consuls, Lu. Opimius & Q. Maximus, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Opimius and Maximus. But Obsequens, L. Opimius and Qu. Fabius Maximus. Plinie speaketh of them in his second booke, saying, About the sunne there appeared an arch or bow, when L. Opimius and Q. Fabius were Consuls. This Qu. Fabius Maximus is by Cicero in Brutus, Florus in his Epitome, Velleius in his 2 booke, and Pædianus upon the Orations against Verres, rightly named the nephew of Paulus, and son of Fabius Aemilianus. And so may Strabo, Appian, and Plinie bee well reprovved, for making him and his father Aemilianus, all one. The same man, as Cicero and Plinie testifie, was surnamed Allobrogicus, upon a victorie over the Allobroges. Of this Lucius Opimius Consul, after whose name there was a wine called Opimianum, Plinie maketh mention in his fourteenth booke and fourth chap. Plutarch also in C. Gracchus, and Velleius in his second booke.

Vuuuu

634

P. Manlius. C. Papyrius.

Cassiodorus inferreth for this yeeres Consuls, P. Manlius and C. Papyrius. The Sicilian records Manlius and Carbo. This is that Caius Papyrius Carbo, who being a Tribune of the Commons when Claudius and Perpenna were Coss, was afterwards by C. Gracchus appointed for one of the Triumvirs to devide lands: who first tooke part with the Commons, but afterwards raunged with the nobilitie: of whom Cicero in many other places, and namely in his second booke of a perfect Oratour, maketh mention.

L. Caelius. L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens put downe for Consuls, Lucius Caelius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue, Metellus and Cotta. Plutarch in Marius speaketh of Caelius Metellus and Cotta, Consuls. Which Marius he writeth to have borne the Tribuneship of the Commons, when these were Consuls, and to have cast Metellus the Consull into prison. This is that Cotta, in whose consular rounge Velleius reporteth, that C. Caesar Flamin of Iupiter, was created.

M. Cato. Q. Martius.

This yeere had for Consuls Mar. Cato and Q. Martius: witnesseth Cassiodorus and Obsequens. Cato and Martius, according to the Sicilian registers. But Eutropius nameth them M. Porcius Cato and Q. Martius. Valerius speaketh of them in his first booke, and Plinie in his second booke and one and thirtieth chap. Gellius also in his 13 booke and 19 chapter.

Consuls next ensuing by Cassiodorus his saying, were L. Caelius and Q. Mutius. After the Sicilian registers, Metellus and Scævola, if ye go by Eutropius, L. Caelius Metellus and Q. Mutius Scævola. Now is this that L. Caelius Metellus, who afterwards upon subduing the Dalmatians, was surnamed Dalmaticus, whom Plutarch in Coriolanus and in his booke of the Romane fortune, nameth Dindematus, for that a long time he bound up his forehead with a frontlet or wreath which they call a diademe, to hide an ulcer that hee had there. Hereupon, when Pompeius bound up his leg with a white band or garter, It makes no matter qd. Favonius, in what part of the bodie a man weareth the diademe: upbraiding and reproching him for his kinglike power, in tearing a small clout or peece of cloth by that name. This is that Q. Mutius Scævola the Augur, of whom Cicero in his booke Lælius, and in the first booke of an Oratour maketh mention.

C. Licinius Geta. Q. Maximus.

Cassiodorus coupleth together in societie of Consullship this yeere, C. Licinius and Qu. Maximus. The Sicilian registers name them Geta and Eburinus. Of this Q. Maximus Cicero speaketh in his Oration for Murena. That this man was of the house of the Fabij, his surname Eburinus sheweth, of whome writeth Festus in this manner: Qu. Fabius was called Pullus Iovis, surnamed Eburinus, of whitenesse, for that his buttocke was blasted with lightening. Quintilian in his third Declamation reporteth, that this Fabius Eburinus had a sonne unchast of his bodie, whom he examined at home in his house, and thereupon put him to death. The same man Valerius calleth Qu. Fabius Servilianus. As for the name of this Licinius his father, obscure and unknowne heretofore, Goltzius out of an old antiquitie of coin hath restored it, wherein as he saith, was written plainly, C. Licinius Geta, son of Publius.

M. Metellus. M. Scaurus.

The Consuls next following by Cassiodorus his report, were Mar. Metellus and M. Scaurus. As for Metellus, the third sonne he was of Macedonicus: But astouching M. Scaurus, whome the writer of the booke entituled of Famous persons, calleth M. Aemilius Scaurus, thus writeth Pædianus: M. Scaurus (quoth hee) was a Patritian indeed and of noble blood, but so, as the gentrie of his house, for those discontents before him lay obscure, for neither father, nor grandfire, by reason of their poore estate, and for want of putting forth themselves in the world, attained to dignitie nitie in weale publicke. Moreover, of him Cicero maketh mention oftentimes in his Oration for Murena and in Brutus. Valerius also in his first booke and eight chapter, and Plinie likewise in his second booke and sixe and thirtieth chapter.

M. Acilius Balbus. C. Cato.

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls this yeere, M. Acilius Balbus, and C. Cato. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus and Cato. Obsequens M. Acilius and C. Portius. Of the same Consuls Plinie speaketh in the 2 booke, chap. 29 and 58. Plutarch in Marius giveth to Acilius the surname Marius. This C. Cato is the brother of that M. Cato, who foure yeeres before was Consull, nephew to M. Cato Censorinus, & Africanus sisters sonne as saith Velleius, Cicero against Verres, and in Brutus.

C. Caelius. Cn. Papyrius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens set downe for next Consuls, C. Caelius and Cn. Papyrius. The Sicilian registers Metellus and Carbo. Eutropius, C. Caelius Metellus, & Cn. Carbo. The same men Tacitus in his booke of the manners of Germanes reported to have borne the Consullship, anno 640 after the foundation of Rome: in which yeere, both he and Obsequens doe report, that the people of Rome began first to war with the Cimbrians and the Teutones. This C. Metellus was the fourth sonne of C. Metellus the sonne of Macedonicus: whom when he died, he left a man of Pretors calling, and in suit and election for to be Consull. This man gat a surname by way of reproch, as Cicero testifieth in his second booke of a perfect Oratour. Now surnamed was hee Capriarius, as Plutarch saith in the Life of the Romans.

M. Livius Drusus. L. Piso.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth unto us for this yeeres Consuls, M. Livius Drusus and L. Piso. The Sicilian catalogue Drusus and Piso. L. Piso surnamed Cæsonius a man of Consular degree, was slaine after by the Tigurines, when Lu. Cassius was Consull, as Orosius testifieth.

Cassiodorus nameth this yeere for Consuls, P. Scipio and L. Calpurnius Bestia. The Sicilian records Nasica and Bestia. Obsequens, Pub. Scipio and L. Calpurnius. Salust, Eutropius, and Orosius, P. Scipio Nasica and L. Calpurnius Bestia. Of these Consuls, P. Nasica Scipio & L. Bestia, Valerius likewise maketh report, lib. 1. cap. 6. Moreover, Cicero in his Brutus writeth, that P. Scipio the sonne of Pub. Scipio surnamed Serapion and fellow Consull to L. Bestia, died in his Consullship. Of this Bestia there is some mention to be scene in a capitoll fragment.

Sp. Postumius. M. Minutius.

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls, Sp. Postumius and M. Minutius. The Sicilian registers Albinus and Rufus. Salust, Sp. Albinus and Q. Minutius Rufus. Of M. Minutius, Velleius and the threescore and seventh Epitome make mention.

645

Q. Metellus. M. Silanus.

Cassiodorus saith that the Consuls next following were Q. Metellus and M. Silanus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Metellus and Silanus. Pædianus and Eutropius, Qu. Caelius Metellus Numidicus, and M. Iunius Silanus. Of them also Cicero speaketh in Brutus. This Metellus was surnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witnesseth Velleius.

Ser. Galba. M. Scaurus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens deliver for the Consuls of this yeere, Servius Galba and M. Scaurus. The Sicilian evidences, Sulpitius and Scaurus. Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, saith that Servius Galba was a man of Consular degree, when Marius was the first time Consull. Of M. Scaurus the Consull, Velleius and Tacitus make mention. This is that Mar. Aurelius Scaurus, who being afterwards in embassy was by the Cimbrians murdered, as appeareth in the threescore and seventh Epitome.

Vuuuu ij

L. Cassius. C. Marius.

Cassiodorus joineth in the Consulship this yeere, L. Cassius and C. Marius: Cuspinians booke and the Sicilian records, Longinus and Marius. Plinie also maketh mention of them in his tenth booke and thirteenth chap. Cicero in his Oration for Plancius: Plutarch in Marius; and Cicero againe in his third booke of Duties, writeth, that C. Marius having taken the repulse twise for the office of Edileship, was created Consull.

648

Q. Servilius Cæpio. C. Atilius.

Obsequens and Cassiodorus match Consuls together this yeere, Q. Servilius Cæpio and C. Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian monuments Cæpio and Serranus. In this yeere upon the third day of Ianuarie Mar. Tullius Cicero was borne, as Gellius in his fifteenth booke and eight and twentieth chapter hath left written. Much mention there is made of these Consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers.

649

P. Rutilius Rufus. C. Manilius.

P. Rutilius Rufus and C. Manilius, are put downe by Obsequens and Cassiodorus for this yeeres Consuls. This P. Rutilius, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the sonne of Marcus. About the other Consull the Annales doe varie and disagree; some forename him C. others Cneus: Some name him M. Manlius, others Mallius or Manilius. But all this controversie is decided by an old antiquitie in stone at Puteoli: the inscription whereof testifieth that P. Rutilius and Cn. Mallius were Consuls; as also the evidence of the Sicilian registers, wherein written it is Rufus and Mallius. Of this Mallius, mention there is made in Cicerones Orations for Plancius and Muræna likewise in Valerius, Salust, Tacitus, Florus, Eutropius and Orosius. That hee was not onely a base man and of low birth, but also without all vertue and wit, in the course of his life also vile and contemptible, Cicero writeth in his Oration for Plancius. Whereby it easily appeareth, that the Mallij were a kindred different from the Manlij. For of Cn. Manlius a Patritian, and that of a most noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such termes.

C. Marius. II. C. Flavius Fimbria.

The next Consuls are set downe by Cassiodorus, C. Marius the second time, and C. Flavius Fimbria: by Obsequens, C. Marius and C. Flavius. By the Sicilian registers Marius and Fimbria: by Pædianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, C. Marius the second time, and C. Fimbria; Item, C. Marius and Caius Flavius. Besides, Cicero, Velleius, Valerius, Plutarch, and others speake often of these Cons.

C. Marius. III. L. Aurelius Orestes.

Cassiodorus reporteth for this yeeres Consuls, C. Marius the third time, and L. Aurelius Orestes. The Sicilian catalogue Marius and Orestes. Moreover, Marius even in his absence was elected Consull the third time, for feare of the Cimbrian warre which was differed, as Velleius, Eutropius, the Breviarie, and Cicero in his Oration concerning provinces, doe testifie.

652

C. Marius. IIII. Q. Lutatius.

Next after them are put downe for Consuls by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, C. Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers exhibite unto us Marius and Cæsius, Plutarch and Eutropius, Caius Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius Catulus. Of these Consuls, Cicero and Plinie oftentimes make mention.

C. Marius. V. M. Aquilius.

Then succeeded in the Consulship by the testimonie of Cassiodorus, C. Marius the fifth time, and M. Aquilius. Of this C. Marius five times now Consull, Plutarch and Florus give report. And Cicero in his second booke of a perfect Oratour, nameth M. Aquilius for the companion of C. Marius in his fifth Consulship. Of whom Plutarch in Marius speaketh, and calleth him μείζων ἐκράτεις, as also Appian in Mithridatica. Now this Manius Aquilius a Consular man, is the same, who afterwards being an embassadour, was by king Mithridates taken prisoner, and most villanously tormented and mangled.

C. Marius VI. L. Valerius Flaccus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens shew unto us for this yeeres Consuls, C. Marius the sixth time, and L. Valerius Flaccus. The Sicilian records, Marius and Flaccus. This L. Flaccus (afterwards Cenfor) was President of the Senat, and master of the horsemen under Sylla Dictatour. Of these Consuls Cicero speaketh verie often, and namely in his Brutus, in his oration for Rabirius, against Catiline and Antonie; and also in the defence of Plancius. Plinie likewise in his second booke, Velleius, and Pædianus upon the oration against Pifo. Moreover, Plutarch, and many authours besides. In this yeere (upon the twelfth day of Iuly, then called Quintilis, as Macrobius witneseth) was C. Caesar borne, who afterwards was surnamed Dictatour.

M. Antonius. A. Postumius.

Reported it is by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, that M. Antonius and A. Postumius were Consuls this yeere. The Sicilian registers, shew Albinus and Antonius. In a fragment also of the capitoll marbles, mention there is of A. Postumius. Cuspinians booke and the Greeke records, have Antonius and Albinus. Of these Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his returne out of exile. Likewise Plinie in his 8 booke and 7 chapter, where he noteth this the 655 yeere. Also Gellius in his 4 booke and 6 chap.

Q. Metellus. T. Didius.

Q. Metellus and T. Didius succeeded Consuls next in this yeere, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens doe write. And Pædianus upon the oration for Cornelius, nameth them: Curio (saith he) accused Q. Metellus Nepos, son of Balearicus, and nephew of Macedonicus, who was Consull with T. Didius. Cicero speaketh of the same man in his oration after his returne.

657

Cn. Lentulus. P. Crassus.

Not onely Cassiodorus, but the Sicilian registers also, doe testifie, that Cn. Lentulus and P. Crassus were Consuls this yeere: and Obsequens nameth them, Cn. Cornelius and

P. Licinius. Plinie writeth of them in his tenth booke and first chapter: also in his 33 booke and second chapter.

Cn. Domitius. C. Cassius.

This yeer had for Consuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Cassius, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do witnesse. Cuspinians annals and the Greeke registers, shew Ænobarbus and Longinus. A fragment of Verrius Flaccus his marbles, Ænobarbus and C. Cassius sonne of Lucius. Pædianus speaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.

L. Crassus. Q. Scaevola.

L. Crassus and Q. Scaevola were Consuls next following, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In a fragment of the capitoll records as touching Consuls, is to be seene Crassus and Marius. In Cenforinus, we find L. Licinius son of Lucius. Cite. in his Brutus writeth, that Crassus the oratour bare all dignities of magistracie, together with Scaevola the highpriest, except the Tribunat of commons and the Cenforship: also that whiles they two were Consuls, Q. Hortensius pleaded the first cause that ever he undertooke, at the barre. Pædianus upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelius, maketh mention of L. Licinius Crassus the Oratour, and Q. Mutius Scaevola the arch-bishop, an oratour besides and a professed lawier, both Consuls together.

C. Calpurnius. L. Domitius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens declare for this yeeres Consuls, C. Calpurnius and L. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Caldus and Ænobarbus. In a capitoll fragment, they are Calpurnius and L. Domitius sonne of Cn. Asfor Caldus, it is the surname of Calpurnius. For Velleius maketh mention of one Calpurnius Caldus, under Augustus. In like manner Cicero in his booke entituled, The suing for a Consulship, and in his oration for Muræna. Also Pædianus upon the Oration for Cornelius. Againe, Cicero in his Brutus, nameth them next before Herennius.

661

C. Valerius Flaccus. M. Herennius.

Here are matched by Cassiodorus and Obsequens for Consuls this yeere, C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius.

Flaccus and Mar. Herennius. The Sicilian records, Flaccus and Herennius. A broken stone of the capitoll, hath Flaccus and M. Herennius. Plinius in his 29 book and 3 chapter; Cicero also in his Oration for Muræna, and in Brutus, speaketh of them.

C. Claudius Pulcher. M. Perenna.

Consuls this yeere, were C. Claudius Pulcher, and M. Perenna, as witnessse Cassiodorus and Obsequens. Likewise in a capitoll broken monument, and in the Sicilian register, it is Pulcher and M. Perenna. Cicero maketh mention of this Claudius as Pretor of Sicilie, in the fourth Oration against Verres; and as Ædile Curule, in his second book of Offices. So doth Plinie in his 8 booke.

663

L. Martius. Sext. Julius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens name for Consuls this yeere, L. Martius and Sext. Julius. The Sicilian records, Philip and Cæsar. Eutropius and Orosius, Sext. Julius Cæsar, and L. Martius Philippus. A capitoll fragment, Philip and Sext. Julius, son of Caius. Plinie speaketh of them in his 2 booke 8 chapter: also in the 33 booke and 3 chapter. In like maner Cic. many times, and Valerius.

L. Julius Cæsar. P. Rutilius Lupus.

According to Cassiodorus and Obsequens, the Consuls this yeere, were L. Julius Cæsar, and P. Rutilius Lupus. And so it is in Pædianus, Velleius, and the 73 Epitome: as also in other authors who have written of the Marlian warre. In a fragment of the capitoll, they are seene written, Cæsar, and P. Rutilius son of Rufus. In the Sicilian records, Cæsar and Lupus. Cicero in his booke of Divination, speaketh of them both: and in his oration for Plancius he writeth, that L. Cæsar missing of an Ædileship, became a Consul.

665

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls this yeere, L. Portius and Cn. Pompeius. Pædianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, furnameth Cn. Pompeius, Strabo; and L. Porcius Cato. The capitoll fragment shew no more but Strabo and Cato. Appius hath made mention of these Consuls: so have Orosius and others that have penned the Marlian warre. This Cn. Pompeius was father to that Cn. Pompeius the Great: as Appian witnesseth, and Pædian upon the oration against Piso.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this yeers Consuls, L. Sylla and Q. Pompeius: and the same is written in Obsequens, Velleius, Eutropius, Orosius, Appian, Plutarch, and others. The Sicilian records, have Sylla and Rutilius Sylla, after his victorie in the civill war, would needs have himselfe surnamed Felix: and therefore Pædian and the avouchers of the capitoll monuments, in reporting this consulate, write thus; L. Sylla, who afterwards was called Felix. The same man in his second Consulship, (which appeareth upon record in the capitoll) is named the sonne of Lucius, and nephew of Publius. Moreover, of Q. Pompeius Rufus, Cicero maketh mention in his Brutus.

Reported there are by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers for Consuls this yeere, L. Cinna and Cn. Octavius. Appian, Velleius, and the rest, who have recorded the historie of this time, name them L. Cornelius Cinna, and Cn. Octavius. Plutarch writeth, that L. Cinna, being of the adverse faction to L. Sulla, was by him made Consul, upon condition, that he should not crosse nor stand against the proceeding of the said L. Sulla: and so soone as hee was entred into place of government; hee began to trouble and disquiet the present state of the common-weale, yea and intended an action against Sulla, by the meanes of Virginus a Tribune of the commons. Howbeit Sulla contemning Virginus, made an expedition against Mithridates.

668

L. Cinna II. C. Marius VII.

After this, were Consuls, C. Marius the seventh time, and L. Cinna the second time, according to the records of Sicilie, Cassiodorus, rus, and those that wrote of the civill war. Plutarch saith, that Marius was the first man that was seven times Consul of Rome. Moreover, as it is to be read in Appian, and in the Breviaries, L. Cinna and C. Marius, without any lawfull assembly for Election, declared themselves Consuls against this yeere, and the very same day that they entred into their magistracie, Marius commaunded Sext. Licinius a Senator, to be throwne downe from the rocke Tarpeia: who, after hee had committed many hainous crimes and outrages, ended his daies upon the Ides of Ianuarie: in whose rounge was subordained, L. Valerius Flaccus, even hee (as men think) who before-time was colleague to Caius Marius in his sixt Consulship: of whome Cicero maketh mention in his oration for his sonne Flaccus.

L. Cinna III. Cn. Papirius.

Cassiodorus witnesseth, that the Consuls succeeding in this yeere, were L. Cinna the third time, and Cn. Papirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinna and Carbo. In the 83 Breviary it is written, that L. Cinna and Cn. Papirius Carbo, for two yeeres together usurped the Consulate. Also in the booke entituled, Of famous persons, wee read that Cinna made himselfe Consul a second and third time. Of these Consuls Plutarch speaketh in Sulla, Appian in Mithridatica, and in the first booke of civill warres.

670

L. Cinna IV. Cn. Papirius II.

Next were Consuls, after Cassiodorus and the Epitomis, L. Cinna, the fourth time, and Cn. Papirius the second time. Cicero in his Tusculane questions mentioneth Cinna foure times Consul: so doth Suetonius in Cæsar. And of Cn. Papirius Carbo twice Consul, the capitoll tables doe yeeld testimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put downe for Consul, (not without suspicion of error) Carbo and Scipio.

671

L. Scipio. C. Norbanus.

Besides the Sicilian tables, Cassiodorus, Obsequens, Appian, Eutropius, Florus, and Tacitus in his nineteenth book do witness, that Lucius Scipio, and Caius Norbanus were Consuls. In the capitoll fragments it is written, Lucius Cornelius sonne of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Asiaticus.

C. Marius. Cn. Carbo III.

I Find in Cassiodorus, Appianus, Velleius, and others, the next Consuls to have been, C. Marius and Cn. Carbo the third time. This C. Marius was the brothers sonne of C. Marius seven times Consul, according to Appian: but Velleius, Paterculus, Plutarch, Eutropius, and others, say, that hee was the sonne of that C. Marius: and haply indeed hee was adopted by C. Marius. Certes in the capitoll tables, hee is called C. Marius, sonne of C. and nephew of Caius. Cicero speaketh of these Cons. against Rullus: Plinie also in his seventh booke, and they who have set downe in writing the civill warres of Sylla.

M'. Tullius. Cn. Dolabella.

Next to those, Cassiodorus bringeth in for Consuls, M'. Tullius and Cn. Dolabella. The Sicilian records, have Decula and Dolabella. Appian also reporteth, that Sylla Dictator, to the end that the state and common-weale might seeme to retaine some shew yet of her auncient dignitie, permitted M'. Tullius and Cornelius Dolabella to be created Consuls, whiles himselfe after the manner of K. sat aloft in a throne above them. Cicero in his oration against Rullus, and Gellius in his 15 booke and 33 chap. maketh mention of M'. Tullius and Cn. Cornelius Consuls. In a capitoll fragment, this M'. Tullius, sonne of M. nephew of A. is surnamed Decula.

674

L. Sulla II. Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers, set downe for Consuls, L. Sylla, the second time, and Q. Metellus. Appian saith moreover, that Sylla, Dictator though hee was, yet stood content and willing to be declared Consul with Q. Metellus Pius, to the end that the common-weale might seeme to have some likenes yet of a free state. Of these Consuls, Cic. maketh mention in his Orations against Verres, and elsewhere. Gellius likewise in his 15 book & 28 chapter, together with Cassiodorus. This

This Metellus was surnamed Pius. Hee it is, who was by lot appointed to manage the warres in Spaine and against Sertorius; and sonne hee was to Nymidicus.

P. Servilius. App. Claudius.

The next Consuls, were P. Servilius and App. Claudius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. In the Sicilian tables, it appeareth that their surnames were, Futia and Pulcher: of whome Appianus writeth thus; The people of Rome in obsequious manner to court Sylla the Dictator, requested of him that hee would continue Consull still another yeere: But Sylla would none of that: and tooke order, that Servilius Isauricus and Claudius Pulcher, should be declared Coss. In a fragment of the capitoll he is thus written; Pub. Servilius Patis, called afterwards Isauricus: which surname hee tooke of the Isaurians, a nation in Cilicia whome hee subdued. My authors are, Pædianus upon the Orations of Cicero against Verres; Strabo in his 14 booke; Marcellinus likewise in his 14 booke, with others.

M. Lepidus. Q. Catulus.

Mar. Lepidus and Q. Catulus, are by Cassiodorus named Consuls for this yeere. Plutarch reporteth, that when L. Sylla had given up his Dictatorship, and restored againe to the people of Rome the free libertie to dispose of consular dignities in their solemne assemblies for elections; M. Lepidus an enemy to Sylla, and an audacious person, was declared Consull before Catulus, and had the preheminence above him, by the earnest endeavour of Cn. Pompeius. Of these Consuls, Plinie maketh mention in his 36 booke, wherein he saith, that they governed in the yeere 676. Likewise Cicero in his Oration for Cornelius: Florus out of Livy: Valerius 2 booke 3 chap. and Eutropius.

M. Aemilius. D. Brutus.

This yeere had for Consuls, by the testimonie of Cassiodorus and Obsequens, M. Aemilius and D. Brutus. Macer, a Tribune of the commons, speaketh of them in Salust, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppressed. In like sort, Cicero in Brutus, and in his second booke of Duties, as also Valerius in the 7 booke and 7 chap. This M. Aemilius was surnamed Lepidus and Livianus: for out of the familie of Livius he was adopted by Mamercus Lepidus, and therefore right well hee is called, sonne of Mamercus.

Cn. Octavius. C. Curio.

Verrius Flaccus setteth downe for Consuls, Cn. Octavius sonne of M. nephew of C. and C. Scribonius Curio. The same doth Cicero report in Brutus. So doe Salust, Obsequens, Lactantius in his first booke, and Plinie in his second booke and 35 chapter. Cicero in his Brutus, and Plinie in his 7 booke and 41 chapter, make report of three Caij Curions, all Orators, to wit, the father, the sonne, and the sonnes sonne or nephew.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls this yeere, L. Octavius and C. Cotta. Obsequens, C. Aurelius and L. Octavius. Plinie in his second booke and 35 chapter: Cicero likewise in his third and fifth Orations against Verres, maketh mention of L. Octavius, and C. Aurelius Consuls. Vpon the broken marbles of the capitoll, they stand to be seene, L. Octavius sonne of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Aurelius. This yeere the Sicilian registers over-skip. Pædianus writeth, that there were at this time three Cottas brethren, and all of consular degree, namely, Cains, Marcus, and Lucius.

For this yeeres Consuls, Cassiodorus registereth L. Lucullus and M. Cotta. The Sicilian records, Lucullus and Cotta. Eutropius, Appianus in Mithridatica, and Plutarch in Lucullus, nameth them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M. Aurelius Cotta. Mention there is made of them by Cicero against Verres; and by Florus in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grandfather that Lucullus, who was Consull with A. Albinus, as Cicero and Plutarch doe testifie.

681

M. Lucullus. C. Cassius.

This yeere (by the testimonie of Cassiodorus) had for Consuls; Marcus Lucullus and C. Cassius:

M. Crassus. Cn. Pompeius.

C. Cassius, but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Cassius: whom Cicero in an oration against Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C. Cassius: saying that the lawes Terentia and Cassia, were by them promulged. For, so farre forth as we may conjecture by the capitoll fragments, M. Licinius Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentius Varro Lucullus. Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutarch, call Lucius Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Eutropius nameth cousin germanes by two sisters. That the surname of Cassius was Varus, appeareth both by a conduit pipe or waterspout of lead found in Rome, and also for that Appian in his fourth booke, writeth that C. Cassius Varus, a man who had bene Consull, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

L. Gellius. Cn. Lentulus.

The Consuls next following, by the report of Cassiodorus, were L. Gellius & Cn. Lentulus. In like sort Cicero maketh mention of them in his oration for Balbus, and else where. Plutarch also in Crassus, with Eutropius and Orosius. Cuspinians booke sheweth Poplicola and Lentulus. Now the surname of Lucius Gellius was Poplicola, as witnesseth Onuphrius.

Cn. Aufidius. P. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls this yeere, Cn. Aufidius and P. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers have Lentulus and Orestes. Eutropius, Cornelius Lentulus and Cn. Aufidius Orestes. This Cn. Aufidius Orestes, when hee went beside a tribuneship of the commons, was chosen Consull, as Cicero writeth in his oration for Plancius. This is that P. Lentulus surnamed Sura, who afterwards, being a man of Consular calling, and who had been twice Pretour, was hanged and strangled to death when Cicero was Consull, for that he had conspired with Catilin: whose grandfather was P. Lentulus President of the Senate, as Cicero saith, pleading for his house, and inveighing against Catilin: as also Pædianus.

Pædianus writing upon Tullies Oration against Piso, Dio likewise & Cassiodorus, joine together in the Consullship this yeere, L. Caecilius Metellus & Q. Marcus. The Greeke records, Marcus Rex, and Metellus. This Metellus, Dio writeth to have died in the very beginning of his magistracie: that hee also who was substituted in his roume, left this life before hee entred into the government: and thereupon it was not thought good to subiect any more: and by that means Quintus Marcus bare that dignitie alone: and him Salust entituleth with the surname of Rex. This Lucius Metellus was brother to Quintus Creticus, as Pædian witnesseth.

C. Piso

C. Piso. M'. Glabrio.

Here succeeded Consuls, C. Piso & M'. Glabrio, witnesseth Cassiodore & the Sicilian records. And in Dio they follow immediately by the name of Manius Acilius and C. Piso. Cicero in his twelfth booke of Epistles to Atticus, speaketh of C. Piso and M'. Acilius Glabrio, men of Consular place and calling. Pædian in his commentaries upon the oration for Cornelius maketh mention of C. Piso and the law Calpurnia by him made, as touching inordinat and indirect suite after dignities of state. Moreover, of them Valerius in his fourth booke writeth.

M'. Lepidus. L. Volcatius.

Cassiodore putteth down for Consuls, Manius Lepidus, and with him L. Torquatus, but untruly, The Greeke records have Volcatius Tullus, Dio Lu. Tullus, and Aimilius Lepidus. Salust in Catiline, L. Tullus and M'. Lepidus. Pædian upon the oration for Cornelius, M'. Lepidus and L. Volcatius. Cicero in his oration for Sulla hath L. Volcatius Tullus: so as it appeareth it should bee, M'. Aemilius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus.

The Consuls elect, were L. Antonius Patas (as it appeareth upon a monument of a triumph in the capitoll, and not Antonius, as commonly it is read) and P. Cornelius Sulla, who being condemned for ambitious seeking after that office, and having therefore suffered condigne punishment, their accusers stept into their place of government, namely L. Aurelius sonne of Marcus, surnamed Cotta; and L. Manilius sonne of Lucius, surnamed also Torquatus: as testifie Salust, Dio, Pædian upon the oration for Cornelius, and that which hee made in his white robe: and lastly, Tranquillus in Cæsar.

690

The yeere next ensuing had for Consuls, by the testimonie of Cassiodore, Pædianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Cæsar and C. Figulus, whome Dio calleth Lucius Cæsar, and Lucius Martius son of Caius, surnamed Figulus. Cicero in his oration for Sulla, nameth them Lucius Inbrius and C. Figulus: so doth Salust in Catiline. This L. Inbrius Cæsar is his sonne who was Consull in the Marfan warre.

M. Cicero. C. Antonius.

The Consuls this yeere, were M. Tullius son of M. surnamed Cicero, and C. Antonius son of M. as testifie Dio in his seven and thirtieth booke, Cassiodore, Salust in his Catilinarian oration, Velleius in his second booke, Ioseph in his Iewish antiquities 14 booke 8 chapter. Plinie in his eight booke and three and fiftieth chapter; Tranquillus in the life of Augustus, Appian, Eutropius, Pædian, and others.

Here followed Consuls next, D. Silanus, and L. Murena, as Cassiodorus, Salust, and the Sicilian records do witnesseth. Dio calleth them D. Junius son of M. surnamed Silanus: and L. Licinius son of L. surnamed Murena. Eutropius nameth them D. Junius Silanus, and L. Licinius, sonne of that L. Murena who in qualitie of Pro-petour triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero saith) pleading for Murena himselfe, being accused and in trouble for unlawfull seeking to be Cof. In this assembly for election of Cof. L. Sergius Catilina suffered the second repulse: for anger whereof, in a melancholy hee brake out into a conspiracie, and practised against the state; and likewise Servius Sulpitius Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accused Murena for the crime aforesaid.

M. Pupius. M. Valerius.

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls this yeere, M. Pupius and M. Valerius. The Sicilian registers, Piso and Messala. Dio, M. Pupius, sonne of M. surnamed Piso: and M. Valerius son of M. surnamed Messala Niger. Of this Messala Niger, there is also mention made by Pædian upon the oration for Scaurus. Also of M. Messala and M. Piso, in Plinies seventh booke, and sixe and twentieth chapter, seven and thirtieth booke, cap. second, and the eight booke, chap. fixe & twentie. And in Cæsars first booke of the Gaules Gaules warre. Of M. Piso Pædian likewise speaketh writing upon the oration against Piso.

Q. Metellus. Q. Afranius.

Cassiodorus & the Sicilian registers nominate for this yeeres Consuls, Q. Metellus and L. Afranius. The like doth Obsequens and Cicero in his first booke of Epistles to Atticus. Dio nameth them L. Afranius sonne of L. and Q. Cæcilius, sonne of Q. surnamed Metellus Celer. Both of them were advanced to the Consulate (as Dio witnesseth) by the means of Pompeius, for they had beene both twaine his lieutenants serving under him in Asia.

C. Cæsar. M. Bibulus.

Cassiodorus, Suetonius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaries, do match together for Consuls this yeere, C. Cæsar and M. Bibulus. Dio, C. Julius sonne of Caius Cæsar, and M. Calpurnius. Plutarch and Appian, C. Julius Cæsar, and Calpurnius Bibulus. Albeit Appian as also Eutropius and Orosius give Bibulus the forename, of Lucius. Of Cæsar and Bibulus, Cicero speaketh in his first booke of Epistles, writing to Lentulus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records shewe for Consuls this yeere, L. Piso and A. Gabinius. Dio, L. Calpurnius sonne of Lucius Piso: and A. Gabinius sonne of Aulus. Cæsar, Cicero, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus, L. Piso, and A. Gabinius. Cæsar writeth of them in his first booke of the Gaules warre, and Plutarch in the life of Cato the younger. Cicero also in his oration against Piso, and for Sextius. This Piso the Consull, Cicero and Pædian surnamed Cæsonius, for so his grandfather before him was called, as appeareth in the capitoll records for the yeere 606.

697

P. Lentulus. Q. Metellus.

The Consuls following for this yeere, were by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records,

P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus. By Dio, Pub. Cornelius sonne of Publius, Lentulus Sponker: and Q. Cæcilius sonne of Quintus Metellus Nepos. Of them speaketh Valerius in his ninth booke. Lentulus (qd. he) and Metellus companions in the Consullship were beheld & seen both upon the stage like plaiers: but the one of them tooke the surname of Spinther one of the second sort of actors: the other, but that he had gotten the name of Nepos already for his lewd behaviour, should have beene called Pamphilus, after the name of *one of a third sort, whome for all the world hee resembled. Of the same men, Cicero in his first booke of Epistles, and in very many of his orations. Plinie also in his seventh booke and second chapter, Plutarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention.

Cn. Lentulus. L. Philippus.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, Cn. Lentulus and L. Philippus. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Philippus. Dio, Cn. Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus: and L. Martius sonne of Lucius Philippus. Of Lentulus and M. Marcellus Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his Epistles to Lentulus. Plutarch also in the life of Cato, maketh mention of Martius Philippus now Consull. This Cn. Lentulus was the son of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero saith in his Brutus. And surnamed hee was Marcellus, and not Claudius, that it might be knowne, of what familie of the Claudij hee was descended.

Cn. Pompeius. M. Crassus.

When as by the obstinate persistence of C. Cato Tribune of the commons, (who ever interposed his negative) there could be no ordinarie assembly holden for the creation of magistrates, the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token of griefe: so as upon an Interregencie between, Cn. Pompeius was chosen Consull, & with him M. Crassus the second time, as Plutarch, Dio, & Appian do witness. Lucius Domitius Aenobarbus, whom Cato and all good men accompanied & presented, was in the common place by violence thoroughly beaten, and Cato himselfe wounded. These Cof. Dio calleth Cn. Pompeius, son of Cneus Magnus the second time: & M. Licinius sonne sonne of Publius, Crassus, the second time. Of them Pædianus, Eutropius, the Sicilian registers and others make mention.

Ap. Claudius. L. Domitius.

DIO in his nine and thirtieth booke, for the yeere after the cities foundation 700, following the computation of Varro, avoucheth Consuls, Appius Claudius, son of Appius, Pulcher; and L. Domitius sonne of Cneus, Enobarbus. Cassiodore and Obsequens, name them, Appius Claudius and L. Domitius, whom the Sicilian records call Pulcher and Enobarbus; and Pædian upon the oration for Scaurus, L. Domitius Enobarbus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher. Of this L. Domitius, sonne of Cneus, Enobarbus, Calius speaketh in the eight booke of Cicerones Epistles.

Cn. Domitius. M. Messala.

Against this yeere there stood in election and labored with much earnestnes & ambitious desire to be Consuls, Caius Memmius, Cn. Domitius, M. Messala and M. Scaurus, as Cicero writeth to his brother Quintus. But at the last, even in the seventh moneth of this yeere there were created by meanes of an Interregencie, M. Messala and Cn. Domitius. Neither had they bene chosen then; but that Q. Pompeius Rufus a Tribune of the commons, who still opposed himselfe to hinder and debarre all election, was by order from the Senate committed: and the Senate made countenance to do the like by the rest, as many as went about to crosse the said election. Thus much Dio. But Appian saith, that the common weale continued for eight months space in Anarchie without any soveraigne magistrates of state. Plutarch writeth, that in this so great extremitie of daunger, Lucilius a Tribune of the commons, preferred a bill for the creating of Cneus Pompeius Dictatour, who should redresse all enormities and set upright the state againe: but Cato gainesaid it, and so nothing was effected. Dio saith moreover, that the Tribunes of the commons mooved for the chusing not of a Dictatour onely, but also of militarie Tribunes in Consuls authoritie: but through the earnest labour of Pompeius, Consuls were created, Messala and Calvinus, which surnames stand to be seene upon the Sicilian records. Also in the capitoll monuments, written it is thus. Cn. Domitius Calvinus sonne of M. nephew of Marcus, ann. 708 and 717.

Cn. Pompeius. Q. Metellus.

When by reason of the contentions among so mighty competitorours, the Consuls could not be created by the kalends of Ianuarie: there passed an Act of the Senate, according to the mind and advise of Bibulus, by vertue whereof Cn. Pompeius was by the Interregent Serv. Sulpitius created Consull the third time, upon the five and twentieth of Februarie, without a colleague first, and presently entred upon the government. But afterwards to avoid the envie that might arise thereupon, he tooke unto him as companion in the Consulship for the five last months of the yeere behind, Q. Cæcilius Pius Metellus Scipio, his wives father. Thus writeth Pædian upon the oration of Cicero in defence of Milo: Plutarch likewise, Appianus & Dio. This Metellus Pius Scipio was also called P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, sonne of Nasica Scipio, who beeing adopted by Q. Metellus Pius, is called by Calius in the familiar Epistles of Cicero, Q. Cæcilius sonne of Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

M. Marcellus. Ser. Sulpitius.

Against this yeere were Consuls created, M. Marcellus, & Serv. Sulpitius, as Cassiodorus, Plutarch, and Appian witness. The Sicilian records call them Rufus and Marcellus. Dio nameth them Servius Sulpitius sonne of Q. surnamed Rufus, and M. Claudius sonne of M. surnamed also Marcellus. Of these Consuls Suetonius also maketh mention in Cæsar: likewise Cicero in his Epistles, & the Epitome 118. This Marcellus was the cousin germane of that Marcellus who the yeere next following was Consull: and brother germane to him who two yeeres after bare the Consulship, as may be collected out of Verrius Flaccus, Dio, and Suetonius.

704

L. Paulus. C. Marcellus.

There succeeded Consuls, L. Paulus and C. Marcellus: witness Cassiodore, Dio, Suetonius, Hirtius in his 8 book, together with the the Sicilian records. The one of these is by Dio named L. Æmilius, sonne of Marcus, surnamed Paulus; the other by Cicero in his epistles, C. Claudius sonne of Caius, Marcellus. Dio writeth, that this man by some was reported to be ἑνελυος, i. the brothers sonne, others ἀδελφός, i. the brother of Mar. Marcellus, but Suetonius saith plainly hee was the brothers sonne.

L. Lentulus. C. Marcellus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this yeere, L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus, as also Appian, Plutarch, Hirtius, Florus, & Cicero in his epistles do testifie. Dio calleth these Consuls Lu. Cornelius, sonne of Publius, Lentulus; and C. Claudius sonne of Marcus, Marcellus. In the broken marbles of the Capitoll it is to be seene thus. C. Claudius sonne of Marcus, nephew of Marcus, Metellus. This is that Lucius Lentulus Cruss, who as Calius testifieth in the former election tooke a repulse, and by Cicero is called in the Oration against Vatinius, Flamen Martialis.

C. Cæsar. P. Servilius.

When Caius Cæsar the Dictatour held the solemn assembly for the election in the latter end of the former yeere, Consuls there were created Caius Julius, sonne of Caius, Cæsar; and Pub. Servilius, sonne of Publius, Isauricus. For now was the yeere come, when as Cæsar by the lawes might be chosen Consull: for so in the third booke of his owne Commentaries hee saith himselfe, and so Dio in his one and fortieth booke, Plutarch, Tranquillus, Appianus, and Cassiodorus doe testifie of him. But hee meaneth that law which expressly forbade and debarred, that no man might be within tenne yeeres space chosen Consull twice. As for Publius Servilius, hee was the sonne of that Pub. Servilius that first tooke the surname Isauricus, who this yeere bare his Consulship at Rome, while Cæsar warred in Macedonie.

Q. Fufius Calenus. P. Vatinius.

Dio saith, that the people of Rome having intelligence that Pompeius was murdered, endeavoured earnestly, that there might passe as honourable decrees for Cæsar the conquerour as possibly might be. And therefore they ordained, that hee might be Consull five yeeres together, and Dictatour not for fixe moneths, as beforetime, but an whole yeere; and endued with the Tribunes authoritie for ever. Now Cæsar, albeit hee was without Italie, immediately entered upon his Dictatourship, having sub-ordained under him for his Generall of the horse, Mar. Antonius, a man who yet had not beene Pretour. This appeareth by the Capitoll records, Dio, Plutarch, and Cicero in his second Philippica. But under what pretence and colour Cæsar tooke upon him this Dictatourship and the rest following, Mar. Antonius sheweth in his Oration of Cæsars praise in Dio: wherein hee saith that Cæsar was created Dictatour to make head against the enemies, and therefore the troubles and dissentions of warre was the cause of this creation. But certaine it is that Cæsar became Dictatour for another cause, namely, that by the meanes of that soveraigne power, hee might draw unto himselfe alone the whole managing & government of the State, which beforetime had beene administred by many persons. But Dio addeth moreover and saith, that in the beginning of this yeere there were neither Pretours nor Consuls elected. For Marcus Antonius Generall of the horse, arraigned in his purple robes, with fixe Licitors, making way before him, resembled a certaine shew of the auncient liberie. But within a while after he departed forth of the cittie, and that which never was before done by any maister of the horse, hee left Lu. Cæsar an aged man, Provost and governor of Rome. Howbeit in the end of the yeere, after the recoverie and conquest of Ægypt, when king Ptolomeus was slaine, and Pharnaces king of Pontus vanquished; Consuls were created, Q. Fufius, sonne of Quintus, Calenus; and Pub. Vatinius, sonne of Publius. And these the Capitoll tables doe shew, and Cassiodorus also. Of Pub. Vatinius Consull, Macrobius in his second booke maketh mention.

C. Cæsar. M. Lepidus.

Verrius in his capitoll tables setteth forth Consuls of this yeere, onely without ever a Dictatour.

a Dictatour. The stone record of Colatia, whereof Onuphrius speaketh heere, nameth C. Julius Caesar the third time, and M. Aemilius Lepidus. But Dio in his three & fortieth booke, The next yeere following (quoth he) hee bare the Dictatourship and the Consulat both, the third time, & tooke unto him for his colleague in both magistracies, M. Aemilius Lepidus. Of the same mind seemeth Tranquillus to bee in Caesar, chap. seventie sixe. Likewise Hirtius in the fift booke. But Onuphrius supposeth that both Tranquillus and Dio, yea and Hirtius also were in an error. For, with the capitoll records, Plutarch and Eutropius agree; who write that Caesar this yeere was Consull the third time with M. Lepidus, and Dictatour the second time.

C. Caesar. Q. Maximus.

They who cut the capitoll marbles, do shew unto us that Caesar this yeere was third time Dictator with M. Lepidus General of the horse. From whence Dio differeth; who doth report that this yeere, Caesar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus second time master of the horse-men: also that Lepidus fellow Consull with Caesar, declared himselfe against all law, Generall of the horse. Thus much of the Dictatour. But as touching the Consuls this yeere, there is to be seene written in the Index or table of Dio, that the same yeere Caesar bare his fourth Dictatourship, & likewise his fourth Consulat without colleague. In that historie also it appeareth, that Caesar presently entered upon his fourth Consulate, but bare it not throughout the whole yeere: and tharso soone as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he resigned & substituted in his place for the rest of the yeere, Q. Fabius Max. and Cn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capitoll fragments wherein it appeareth that Caesar was the fourth time Consull, and that without a colleague; as Sigonius maketh interpretation. For Cuspinians kalender together with the Sicilian registers, doe shew that Caesar was Consull now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutarch make mention of Caesar, who being Consull elect now the fourth time, led an armie into Spaine. As for Q. F. Fabius, Suetonius calleth him a three month Consull. Dio saith moreover, that Caesar upon the death of Q. Fabius the Consull, declared the very last day of the yeere, C. Canticus to bee the Consull for those few houres that were behind. Whereof Cicero in his seventh booke of Epistles, writing to Curius, Macrobius in his second booke of Saturnalia, Tacitus in his eighteenth booke, Plinie in his seventh, and Suetonius in Caesar do make report.

C. Caesar. M. Antonius.

Dio setteth downe for this yeere, Caesar Dictator the fift time, together with M. Aemilius Lepidus master of the horse-men. But the capitoll tables avouch him Dictator now the fourth time. Dio & Appian write that hee created himselfe Consull together with M. Antonius. Likewise Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers give record, that Caesar was this yeere Consull the fift time, together with M. Antonius. And Macrobius in his first booke speaketh of them. Moreover, written it is in the Capitoll and Colotian tables, that C. Caesar was Consull the fift time, with M. Antonius son of M. & that in the room of Caesar there was chosen P. Cornelius son of Publius. And this was P. Cornelius Dolabella, whom Caesar himselfe (if hee had lived) meant to have substituted in his owne rowm. Plutarch writeth, that Caesar Consull now the fift time, tooke unto him for his companion in government M. Antonius. And when as he would have subordeined Dolabella in his owne stead, Antonie gainesaid it in an oration: and afterwards, when Caesar a second time would have had Dolabella to be declared Consull, and still Antonie crossed and withstood it, Caesar gave over his enterprise. But after Caesar was murdered, Antonie (as Dio writeth) fearing some insurrection and commotion if he should have rejected Dolabella, tooke him into the fellowship of government. Appian saith, that immediately after Caesar was killed, Dolabella entred into the magistracie. So saith Velleius also. And this verily was the yeere, in which the conspiracy was contrived against Caesar, whereof the chieftaines were M. & Decimus both Bruti, C. Trebonius and C. Cassius: and upon the fifteenth day of March, when hee sat in counsell together with the Senate in the court of Pompeie, he was stabbed, and received in his bodie three & twentie wounds: which done, the murderers who had wrought the feat seized the capitoll. And C. Octavius his nephew or sisters sonne, whome Caesar had made in his will his halfe-heire, and adopted to beare his owne name, came out of Epirus, whither Caesar had sent sent him before, minding to make warre upon the Parthians, and after all luckie and happie proceedings, took upon him the name of Caesar, according to his last will and testament.

C. Pansa. A. Hirtius.

Dio, Cassiodorus, and the rest, nominate Consuls for this yeere, C. Vibius Pansa Capronianus, and A. Hirtius, sonne of Anlus. Cuspinians booke sheweth Cretonianus and Hirtius. Whereby it may be understood, that Cretonianus was the surname of Pansa, but peradventure written for Capronianus. In the Colotian table they are named C. Vibius, sonne of Caius, and A. Hirtius sonne of Hirtius. This Hirtius was one of their sonnes who were outlawed by Sulla, and whome Caesar (as Dio reporteth) advanced to honourable dignities. Both these, and the Consuls of the yeere following, were by Caesar elected & destined thereto, before hee was slaine. Dio, Appian, and others report, that of these two Consuls, Hirtius in the time of the civile warre, in a battell before Modenna, against Antonius was slain; and Pansa some daies after, upon a hurt received in the same fight, died at Bononia. In the rowme of Pansa, C. Octavius was sub-elected Consull, the nineteenth of August in the same yeere, and hee in steed of Hirtius, tooke unto him for his colleague Q. Pedius.

M. Lepidus. L. Plancus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records put downe for Consuls, M. Lepidus & L. Plancus. Dio, M. Aemilius Lepidus the second time, and L. Munatius, sonne of Lucius, surnamed Plancus. Of these Consuls Suetonius speaketh in Tiberius, saying, That Tiberius was borne after the battell of Philippi, when Mar. Aemilius Lepidus was the second time Consull with Munatius Plancus. Now had there been before appointed Consuls against this yeere by Caesar, D. Brutus and L. Plancus. But by reason that Brutus the yeere before was by the law Pedia condemned and after killed, and so the three Triumvirs usurped the rule of the commonweale; agreed it was, that M. Lepidus one of the Triumvirs who beforetime also had been Consull with Caesar in his third Consullship, should together with Plancus, (who also taking part and siding with Antonie, had revolted from the Commonweale) administer the Consulare. Moreover, this Brutus was by Plutarch, Appian, Dio, and Zonaras, called also Albinus; I suppose, for that out of the race of the Bruti he was adopted and incorporat into the house of the Albini. In this yeere, during the civile war, Brutus and Cassius were slaine in battell before Philippi, as Dio, Plutarch, Appian, and others write.

P. Servilius. L. Antonius.

The Colotian tables, Dio, and Cassiodorus match Consuls together for this yeere, L. Antonius son of Marcus, surnamed Pietas, and P. Servilius, son of Publius, surnamed Isauricus, the second time. Of these Consuls, Suetonius writeth in Tiberius. This P. Servilius was first Consull with Caesar in his second Consulat; whose father Isauricus died a little before, as Dio and Eusebius report. As for L. Antonius, named hee is by Dio Pietas, for that being Consull, he together with Fulvia the wife of his brother Marcus, managed the affaires of state with that mind, as if his whole care had ben for his brother the Triumvir, in regard of which brotherly and affectionate kindnesse, he chalenged the surname of Pietas.

Cn. Domitius. C. Asinius.

A Colotian table, Dio, and Cassiodorus join in the Consulare of this yeere, Cn. Domitius sonne of Marcus, surnamed Calvinus, the second time; and C. Asinius, sonne of Cn. Asinius, surnamed Pollio. Of these, Iosephus speaketh in his fourteenth booke of the Iewes antiquities and three and twentie chapter. Toward the end of this yeere, Dio writeth that these Consuls gave up their place, and that other Consuls were substituted for those few daies that were to come; and one of them was L. Cornelius Balbus Gaditanus. And therefore in the Colotian table these subordained Consuls stand under their names, L. Cornelius, son of Lucius, and P. Canidius, sonne of Lucius. Of Pub. Cornelius Balbus Consull, Plinie writeth in his seventh booke and three and fortieth chapter, and Velleius in his second booke.

L. Censorinus. L. Calvisius.

Cassiodorus inferreth for the next Consuls, Lucius Censorinus and Caius Calvisius, The Sicilian XXXXX ij

Sicilian records have Censorinus and Sabinus. Dio, L. Martius and C. Sabinus, C. Calvisius son of Caius, is named by Dio in the catalogue or table, Sabinus, although it be red there commonly, but amisse, Asinius.

716

Ap. Claudius. C. Norbanus.

Consuls that follow, were App. Claudius and C. Norbanus, as Cassiodorus saith. But as the Sicilian registers purport, Censorinus and Sabinus: as Dio writeth, App. Claudius sonne of Caius Pulcher; and C. Norbanus, son of Caius Flaccus. As touching Tadius after the Consull elect, and substituted in the rowme of another, who before hee entred into government, being terrified with the minatorie threats of C. Caesar, threw himselfe downe headlong, and so brake his necke, see Tranquillus in Augustus.

717

M. Agrippa. L. Caninius.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, M. Agrippa and Lu. Caninius. The Sicilian registers Agrippa and Gallus. Dio, M. Vipsianus, sonne of Lucius Agrippa; and L. Caninius sonne of Lucius Gallus. Iosephus in his fifteenth booke of Antiquities, avoucheth Consuls, Mar. Agrippa and C. Canidius Gallus. Nepos also in the life of Atticus, calleth Vipsianus Agrippa. In the capitoll marbles and in other old monuments of Rome his gentile name is passed over, and namely in the forefront of the temple called Pantheon, where is engraven M. Agrippa sonne of Lucius, Consull the third time. Tacitus also in his first booke mentioneth this Agrippa.

718

L. Gellius. M. Cocceius.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls this yeere, L. Gellius and M. Cocceius. The Sicilian records shew Publicola and Nerva: Dio hath Lu. Gellius sonne of Lucius Poplicola, and M. Cocceius Nerva. Out of the capitoll fragments it appeareth, that L. Gellius was sonne of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dio, this Lu. Gellius was brother to M. Valerius Messala. For it is the same man who was pardoned before by Mar. Brutus: whereby it may be understood, that Poplicola was his surname by way of adoption: for they were not the Gellij but the Valerij, that carried the surname of Publicola. The same fragments doe shew, that the said Gellius left his place, and that another was put in his rowme. And haply it was L. Munatius, sonne of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Plancius: whome Plinie in his thirteenth booke and third chapter, saith to have been twice Consull: but in what yeere he was the second time, a man cannot find, unlesse it were in this.

Sext. Pompeius. L. Cornificius.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records testifie, that this yeeres Consuls were Sext. Pompeius & L. Cornificius. Dio, L. Cornificius son of Lucius, & Sextus Pompeius sonne of Sextus. This yeere Sext. Pompeius, sonne of Cneus, was slaine.

M. Antonius. L. Scribonius Libo.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, Lu. Scribonius and Lu. Atratinus. The Sicilian catalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius sonne of Marcus the second time, and L. Scribonius, sonne of Lucius Libo. The same Dio saith moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, presently upon the very Kalends of Ianuarie gave over the magistracie, and substituted in his own steed Lu. Sempronius Atratinus: and therefore many there be that affirm how it was not Antonius but Atratinus that was Consull this yeere with Libo. That Consuls also were sub-elected to beare out one part of the yeere, it is to be found in some authours that have set forth the Municipall Annales. And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus Aemilius Consull, for one part of the yeere, and that hee built a stately porch or gallerie at his owne charges, and dedicated it in his Consullship.

C. Caesar. L. Volcatius.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth unto us for Consuls, C. Caesar and L. Volcatius. Dio, Caesar the second time, and L. Volcatius sonne of Lucius Tullus. They who composed and digested the Sicilian registers, very unfitly set downe Caesar and Cicero for this yeeres Consuls. Of this Consullship of Caesar, Suetonius and Dio speake, saying that hee held it very few houres, as Antonius also beforetime. In steed of Caesar was Lu. Antonius subrogated, and many other for one one part or other of the yeere, who in the book entituled, Old inscriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

C. Caesar. III. M. Crassus.

Emperour Caesar. II. L. Volcatius.
Kal. Ianuarij. L. Antonius.
Kal. Maij. L. Flavius.
Kal. Iulij. M. Atilius.
C. Fonteius.
Kal. Sept. L. Vinutius.
Kal. Octob. L. Lanonius.

Of L. Flavius made Consull by M. Antonius, and deposed, Dio likewise maketh mention.

722

Cn. Domitius. C. Sosius.

Cassiodorus nominateth for Consuls this yeere, Cn. Domitius and C. Sosius. The Sicilian records, Aenobarbus and Sosius. Dio, Cneus Domitius, sonne of Cneus, nephew of Cneus Aenobarbus; & C. Sosius son of Cneus, nephew of Caius. Nepos writeth, that Atticus died, when Cn. Domitius and C. Sosius were Consuls.

723

C. Caesar. II. M. Messala.

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this yeere, C. Caesar the second time, and M. Messala. The Sicilian registers, Octavianus and Corvinus. Dio, Caesar the third time, and M. Valerius, sonne of Marcus, surnamed Messala Corvinus, and that right truly. For Cassiodorus maketh no reckoning of that consullship of Caesar which hee bare with Pedius, because hee was subordained in the place of another. But Dio and Appian doe witnesse, that Caesar and Antonie were matched together this yeere, both of them in their second Consullship, at what time as upon peace made with Sextus Pompeius, they were appointed Consuls beforehand for eight yeers next ensuing: howbeit, in the first yeer the people turned Antonie out of his Consullship, and proclaimed warre against him and Cleopatra, and so in his place was Mar. Messala declared Consull. As touching the Consuls this yeere subordained, thus wee find written in the ancient inscriptions.

Emperour Caesar. IIII. M. Valerius.
Kalend. Maij. M. Titius.
Kal. Octobris. Cn. Pompeius.

Cassiodorus nameth for this yeeres Consuls, C. Caesar the third time, and M. Crassus. The Sicilian records Octavianus and Crassus. Dio, Caesar the fourth time, and M. Licinius, sonne of Marcus Crassus. Hee addeth moreover and saith, Caesar in the midst of that water crossed the seas out of Macedonie into Italie, wherein he was the fourth time Consull with M. Crassus. Orofius likewise noteth, that Caesar called Emperour, was Consull the fourth time with M. Licinius Crassus. Of other Consuls substituted after M. Licinius, this we find in the old inscriptions.

Emperour Caesar. IV. M. Licinius.
Kal. Iul. C. Antistius.
Idib. Septembr. M. Tullius.
Kal. Novembr. L. Senius.

Of M. Tullius Consull with Augustus, Dio maketh mention in his storie of this yeeres acts. Plinie also in his 22 booke and 6 chap. and Plutarch in Cicero. By Velleius and Tacitus it appeareth that Antistius had for addition the surname of Petus, and Senius of Servinus.

725

C. Caesar. IIII. Sex. Apuleius.

In Cassiodorus the Consuls bee C. Caesar the fourth time, and Sext. Apuleius. In Dio, Caesar the fift time, and Sext. Apuleius son of Sext. In the Sicilian records, Octavianus and Apuleius: in the Antique inscriptions, Emperour Caesar the fift time, and Sext. Apuleius. Dio saith this was the yeere 725 from the foundation of the citie. Of Caesar five times Consull, there is to be seene an old epigramme or inscription in this manner.

Senatus Populusq. Romanus,
Imp. Caf. Divi Iulij Fil. Caf. Quint.
Cof. Desig. Sext. Imp. Sept.
Resp. conservata.

That is,

The Senate and people of Rome. By Emperour Caesar, sonne of Iulius of famous memorie, Consull five times, elect Consull the sixt time, and emperour the seventh, the Commonwealth saved.

Xxxxxx iij

C. Caesar.

726

C. Caesar V. M. Agrippa II.

Cassiodorus declareth for Consuls this yeere, Caesar the fift time, and M. Agrippa the second time. Orofius and the Sicilian records, Caesar the fixt time, and Agrippa the second time. Dio, Caesar the fixt time, and M. Vipsanius Agrippa the third time: but it is to bee read the second time, as Sigonius advertiseth, so as the next yeere it should bee written the third time. And this plainly appeareth by the superscription of that temple (which he erected & named Pantheon) in this form, M. AGRIPPA SON OF L. THIRD TIME COS. BUILT IT. For Dio saith that this temple was finished two yeeres after that hee was Confull with Caesar the seventh time Confull, in which yeere himfelfe bare his third Consulship, & not the fourth. For otherwise in the front of the said temple, hee would have written, CONSUL THE FOURTH TIME.

C. Caesar VI. M. Agrippa III.

Cassiodorus saith, that the next Consuls were Caesar the sixt time, and Mar. Agrippa the third time. But Dio, Caesar the seventh time, and Agrippa the fourth time. But what is to bee thought of them both, is evident by that which hath been said before. In the Sicilian registers verily it is written, Octavianus the seventh time, and Agrippa the third time.

C. Augustus Caesar VII. T. Statilius.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls Caesar Augustus the seventh time, and T. Statilius. The Sicilian monuments, Octavianus the eighth time, and Taurus. Dio, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and Statilius Taurus the second time. For hee had been Confull first, for a part of the yeere, anno 727, and now is the second time: of whom Suetonius writeth thus in Nero; Nero tooke to wife Statilia Messalina, daughter (in the fourth descent) of Taurus, one who had bene twice Confull, and also triumphant: hee writeth also, that Augustus entered upon his eight and ninth Consulate at Tarracon.

C. Caesar Augustus VIII. M. Silanus.

Cassiodorus sheweth for Consuls next, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and M. Silanus. Dio & the Sicilian records, Augustus the ninth time, and M. Silanus. A fragment of the capitol, Emperour Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and M. Iunius Silanus. This yeere Augustus Caesar was called Emperour the eighth time, and shut up the temple of Ianus the fourth time now that ever it was shut: which hee had set open before in regard of certaine warres, as Dio reporteth.

C. Caesar Augustus IX. C. Norbanus.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for this yeeres Consuls, Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and C. Norbanus. The Sicilian registers, Augustus the tenth time, and Flaccus. Dio, and a fragment of the capitol marble, Augustus the tenth time, and C. Norbanus Flaccus. This Norbanus seemeth to be the son of C. Norbanus the Confull, anno 716, for he had not the numeral note testifying a second Consulship.

C. Caesar Augustus X. Cn. Piso.

Cassiodorus setteth downe for Consuls, Caesar Augustus the tenth time, and Cneus Piso. The Sicilian records Augustus the eleventh time, and Dio, Augustus the eleventh time, with Cn. Calpurnius, sonne of Cneus, Piso. By a fragment of the capitol stone it appeareth that Augustus entered the Consulship the eleventh time, together with Aulus Terrentius Varro Murana: also that Murana died in his magistracie, in whose steed was elected Cn. Calpurnius Piso; and Augustus went out of his government. Of which matter Dio thus writeth; Augustus went to the Albane hill, and there resigned up the Consulship. For whereas both hee himfelfe and many others, ever since the time that the C. VV. was set in frame & established, had borne the yeerely magistrates, he thought that from thence forwards hee was to forbear the same, to the end, that the honourable dignitie of Consuls should bee open to as many as might bee. And this did he without the citie, because hee would not bee hindered and letted in the action; and therewith substituted in his his place Lucius Sestius, a man that of all others most affected and loved Brutus; who also wrate of his praises and commendable parts.

M. Marcellus. L. Arruntius.

This yeere had for Consuls, as saith Cassiodorus, M. Marcellus and L. Arruntius: as Dio, M. Claudius son of Marcus, Marcellus; & Afernius son of Lucius. In the Capitol stone these Consuls are thus set downe, L. Arruntius sonne of L. nephew of L. and M. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to understand, that in the Sicilian records the Consuls are not well put downe to be Octavianus the twelfth time, & Arruntius. In this yeere, the conspiracie of Fannius Capio and Varro Murana against Augustus was discovered: and the temple of thundering Iupiter was dedicated, witnesseth Dio.

M. Lollius. Q. Lepidus.

The Colotian stone and Cassiodorus shew for this yeere Consuls, Q. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Lollius. Dio writeth, when Augustus was in Sicilie, & the people of Rome at the assembly for Consuls election, there arose a sedition and commotion. For M. Lollius onely entred upon the government, by reason that the other place was reserved and kept for Augustus: but when he made refusall, Q. Lepidus was created. Of these Consuls Horace in his first booke of Epistles writeth thus:

Me quater undenos sciat implevisse Decembres, Collegam Lepidum quo dixit Lollius anno.

Know he, that 40 winters old and foure, I was that yeere,
At Rome when Confull Lollius, chose Lepidus his feere.

M. Appuleius. P. Silius.

After Cassiodorus, the Consuls that followed for this yeere, were M. Appuleius and P. Silius. But in Dio, M. Appuleius sonne of Sextus, and Publius Silius sonne of Publius, Nerva. In the Sicilian records, Appuleius and Nerva.

C. Sentius. Q. Lucretius.

The Colotian stone, Eusebius in his treatise of Times, Dio and Cassiodorus set fourth as Consuls this yeere, Gaius Sentius, sonne of Caius, Saturninus; and Quintus Lucretius sonne of Quintus, Vspillo. Of this yeeres Consuls thus writeth Dio, Caius Sentius was declared Confull: but for that there was to bee given him a companion, and Augustus refused the second place of Consulship reserved for him; there arose a sedition, untill Augustus pronounced Confull Quintus Lucretius one of the embassadours, whom the Senate had sent unto him about the appeasing of the foresaid sedition; notwithstanding he was a man in times past proscribed and outlawed. The same writeth Velleius in the second booke. In the broken Colotian stone it is to bee read, that the Confull elected in steed of Sentius Saturninus, was Mar. Vinicius sonne of Marcus. Velleius, uno Vinicius adjoineeth as Colleague, Agrippa. In this yeere, after the first tenne yeeres were expired, for which space Augustus together with Agrippa at the first received the Censorian authoritie and dignitie, hee was created a second time by the people over-seere of mens behaviour for the tearme of five yeeres; and resumed the Censours power for the same time; and the Consulare authoritie for ever. So as, at all times and in all places, hee might have twelve licours goe before him with their bundels of rods, and bee allowed to take his place and sit with the Consuls.

Cn. Lentulus. P. Lentulus.

Publius Cornelius sonne of Publius, Lentulus Marcellinus; and Cn. Cornelius son of Lucius, are set downe for Consuls by the Colotian stone table; by Dio also and Cassiodorus. In this yeere Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authoritie of the Emperour Caesar Augustus, obtained of the Senate and people of Rome the Tribunitian power for five yeeres.

C. Furnius

C. Furnius. C. Silanus.

There succeeded Consuls next, according to Cassiodorus, C. Furnius & C. Silanus. After Dio, C. Furnius sonne of C: and C. Iunius sonne of Caius, Silanus. But in the Colotian fragment, C. Furnius sonne of Caius, and C. Iunius. Whiles C. Furnius and C. Iulius Silanus were Consuls, the solemn plaies called Seculares were now the fife time set out by Augustus, as Censorinus and Dio affirme.

Cassiodore nameth for Consuls, Lucius Domitius and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Aenobarbus and Cornelius. Dio, L. Domitius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, Aenobarbus: and P. Cornelius son of P. nephew of Publius, Scipio: In like manner the Colotian table, wherein it standeth, that for P. Cornelius there was substituted L. T. i. Tarius: of whom Plinie in his eighteenth booke and seventh chapter writeth thus, L. Tarius Rufus, a man most base for his parentage, deserved a Consulate under Augustus Cæsar of happie memorie, onely for his militarie service. In this Consuls yeere, was the Quinquennale solemnitie performed, as writeth Dio, in memoriall of the empire of Augustus: and Agrippa one of the Quindecimvirs, had the ordering and setting out thereof.

M. Drusus. L. Piso.

The Consuls next following, were M. Drusus and L. Piso, as Cassiodorus saith. The Sicilian registers name them Libo and Piso. Dio, M. Livius sonne of Lucius, Drusus Libo; and L. Calpurnius sonne of Lucius Piso, M. Drusus sonne of Marcus. L. . . . according to the Colotian fragment.

740

Cn. Lentulus. M. Crassus.

This yeere next following had for Consuls, after Cassiodorus, and the Sicilian monuments, Cn. Lentulus and M. Crassus: whom Dio calleth M. Licinius sonne of Marcus, Crassus; and Cn. Cornelius sonne of Cn. Lentulus. The Colotian fragment, sheweth, Marcus Licinius sonne of Marcus.

T. Nero. P. Quintilius.

Tiberius Nero, and P. Quintilius were Consuls this yeere, as Cassiodorus reporteth. They are named Nero and Varus in the Sicilian Catalogue. And Dio calleth them Titus Claudius sonne of Tiberius, Nero: and P. Quintilius, son of Sextus, Varus. The Colotian fragment, Tiberius Claudius sonne of T. Suetonius writeth, that Tiberius bare his first Consulship but a few daies. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Augustus Cæsar's wives sonne, who after the death of Augustus, attained to the empire, having bene first by him adopted.

M. Messala. P. Sulpitius.

Cassiodorus putteth downe for Consuls, Messala and P. Sulpitius. The Sicilian records, Messala and Quirinus. Dio, M. Valerius sonne of Marcus, Messala Barbatus: and P. Sulpitius sonne of Publius, Quirinus: of whom Suetonius in Claudius and Tacitus in his second booke write. Moreover, this is that Sulpitius Quirinus, who by Iosephus in the seventeenth booke of antiquities and first chapter, is said to have borne the consularie dignitie & was lieutenant in Syria: At which time, our Lord Iesus Christ the redeemer & Savior of mankind, was borne: of whom Saint Luke maketh mention saying: This was the first enrolment or taxation which was made by Quirinus President and governor of Syria. After these Consuls, others were substituted in their place, as the Colotian stone sheweth, wherein it is thus read:

M. Valerius. M. F.
C. Volgins. C. F.
Suff. C. Caninius.

Likewise in Cuspinian his kalender, these Consuls are written with their surnames:

Messala, Quirinus.
Rebulus, Saturninus.
Maximus, Tiberio.

By which it appeareth that Rebulus and Saturninus were the surnames of Caninius Volgus.

Volgus. By a fragment of the capitoll marble, it is evident, that the surnames of Valerius was Aemilianus; of Volgins, Rufus; and Rebulus of Caninius: and that as Rufus was put in the place of Valerius, so Rebulus in stead of Rufus. There remaineth also the memoriall of Rebulus and Saturninus in the Sicilian records. In this yeere, Dio reporteth, that Augustus was a second time made over-seer for mens maners and demeanours five yeeres more: and that he resumed still the same authoritie by times, as also the empire, and therein Agrippa died.

P. Fabius. Q. Elius.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth for this yeeres Consuls, Paulus Fabius & Q. Aelius. Dion, Paulus Fabius, sonne of Quintus Maximus and Tiberio. Of Q. Aelius Tiberio, and P. Fabius Maximus Consuls, Frontius speaketh of in his booke of water conduits: and Plinie in his eighth booke and seventh chapter, where hee writeth that the Theatre of Marcellus was dedicated when Quintus Tiberio and Fabius Max. were Consuls.

744

Iulius Antonius. Q. Fabius.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls this yeere, Iulius Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius. Dio, Iul. Antonius Africanus, and Q. Fabius sonne of Quintus Maximus. The Sicilian catalogue & kalender of Cuspinian, shew Africanus and Maximus, Dio nameth Iulus, the sonne of Antonius. Vnto him Horace writeth in this manner:

Pindorum quisquis studet emulari
Iule, ceratis op: Dædalæ, Nisiitæ pennæ, &c.

With wings devis'd by Dædalus
And glew'd with wax, they flie:
Who strive (ô Iule) with Pindarus
To match his poetrie.

And after,

Tendit (Antoni) quoties in altis Nubium tractus.

——— ô Antoni, so oft
As he doth mount the clouds aloft.

Drusus Nero. Titus Quintius.

There succeeded Coss. according to Cassiodorus, Drusus Nero, and T. Quintius: but after Dio, Nero Claudius, sonne of Tiberius, Drusus; and T. Quintius, sonne of Titus Crispinus. Drusus and Crispinus, by Cuspinian's kalender and the Sicilian registers. This Drusus brother of Tiberius Nero, was Augustus Cæsar's wives sonne: who being Consul, died in Germanie, and both he and his children had the surname of Germanicus, as Dio writeth: which addition the Senat gave him first of that province, as Eutropius saith. With the death of this Drusus ended Livies histories: for thus it is written in the last Epitome, &c. Looke in the said Breviarie.

TO

TO THE READER.

Doubt not but many of them who shall take delight and pleasure in reading the Romane storie above-written, will presently grow into a liking of the very place, which hath afforded so woorthy persons and rare examples. The love whereof hath moved many a man to undertake a voiage to Rome, onely to see the river Tyberis, those seven hills, and the monuments remaning of that famous citie. The journie they have found, for way long and tedious; for expense of money heavie and chargeable; for hazard of religion, conscience and good manners, exceeding dangerous: so farre degenerate are the inhabitants now from that auncient people, so devoute, so vertuous and vncorrupt, in old time. To satisfie the readers in this behalfe, and to avoid the perill of that travaile, I thought it not amisse to bring Rome (as it were) home to them, even to represent unto their eye the topographie thereof, that is to say, the description of the paces, with the memorable edifices, or rather the ruines of those antique buildings, mentioned in the storie aforesaid. And for as much as Bartholmew Marlian hath herein taken paines, and made a treatise therof, worthy in his conceit to be dedicated unto that noble Prince of famous memorie, Francis the French king, the first (I take it) of that name: and for that those learned men, who last set Livie forth in print, have thought good to adjoine thereto, as a necessarie dependant, the foresaid treatise: for my part, having struggled with the difficulties of the Alpes & in some sort overcome the crossed Rhosne and the Po; passed over the hills Olympus and Aemus, & scrawled through the rough streights of Thermopylae and Tempe, seeme now I would not in my returne to stick at the pleasant mounts, Palatine, Capitol, Aventin, &c. with the plains and vallies between, or the river Tybre & Mars field underneath the beutified especially with such stately temples, triumphant arches, glorious palaces, Theatres, Cirque, Columnes, & Colosies, wonders of the world. And albeit I found Marlian far unlike himself, & the book that goeth in his name much corrupt in the print, yet by conference with other authours, I have reformed the faults, and endeavoured that our English edition might in some measure be answerable to the Latine.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

The situation of the Cittie.

Before we enterprise to shew the edifices and buildings of the cittie of Rome, somewhat would be premised of the site thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortall gods; with the invocation of whome, the Poets are wont in every hard and difficult worke, to lay their first ground and make their entrance.

The Capitoll hill, where it is broadest, exceedeth not 800 foot: in length it lyeth out toward the Northwest 1500. It hath a point or wing on either side in fashion of a semicircle, and in compasse containeth well-neere seven * furlongs.

* Stadia.

From this mount as it runneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the same breadth, or somewhat more; making a square with 4 angles of unequall sides, containing 1200 paces. For, the one of 600 foot boundeth upon the Capitoline hill: a second of 700 foot, bendeth to the Northeast: the third, being almost twice as long, looketh toward the Southeast and the mount Caelius: the fourth, which of all others is biggest, and comprehendeth the lifts or shew-place called Circus maximus, directly regardeth the Aventine. On the second side thereof there is one plaine, reaching from the head and top of the Forum Rom. to the utmost skirt of the hill Quirinalis, which bendeth toward the Suburra, and taketh up in breadth 500 foot: but it lyeth out in length almost a mile from both fronts, betwene the Capitoll, the Forum Nervæ, and the mount Caelius: in like manner from the said mount Caelius and Palatine, Suburra and the Esquilæ, as farre as to the Church of Saint M. avecline. A second plaine there is, under the other point and top of the Capitoll, neere the Theatre of M. avecllus, which stretcheth out 500 foot from the mount it selfe, as farre as to the Tyber; and anon over-against the valley, from the crooked reach and course of the river, and the nouke whereby the Aventine is divided from the Palatine, it spreadeth broader: but afterwards betwene the said hills it groweth narrow, untill yee come to Cæliolus and the very gate Capena, where the Aventine is parted from Cæliolus onely by the breadth of the street or high way. The length of this plain is likewise a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aventine; on the left, the Capitoline mount, the Palatine, and Cælius.

Then followeth the mount Cælius (separate from the Palatine by a plaine) resembling a pyramidal ferme of a spire, so as the Base thereof containeth 500 foot neere to the Amphitheatre. Divided also from the same it is by the street Appia, fast by the grand Cirque, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad, betwene Cælius and Cæliolus, lying out in length 4 Stadia, and within a while to the walls which joine close to the mount Cælius, as farre as to the gate Asinaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the citie wall for 4 Stadia, toward the Northeast. From hence the walls meet affont for the space of two Stadia, even to the gate Nævia: from whence as they turne to the Northeast, it is parted from the Esquilæ by the street Labicana; and anon shewing it selfe affont neere Saint M. aveclines, it beareth forward as farre as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certaine forme, it taketh in circuit about 2500 paces. Moreover, the Cæliolus is enclofed within the said valley, the street Appia, and all along Northeast and Southeast, with the citie walls; and hath in compasse well-neere a mile.

The Aventine seemeth to containe two hilles; the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from Tyber along the wallles, and anon neere the gate Hostiensis, is divided and cut with a crooked street-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirque, and the the mount Caelius: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Caelius by the street Appia, untill you come to the gate Capena. It had in compasse 12 Stadia, as Dionysius also testifieth; and on the Southeast; a most spacious and large plaine of 4 unequal sides: toward the South containing almost sixe Stadia, VVestward five, somewhat lesse Eastward, but toward the Tyber not above foure.

The Esquiline on the South part is divided with the street Labicana; on the Northwest, with the valley lying betwene Caelius, Palatinus, and it selfe; on the North, the Subura; and from the Viminal hill, the street called Patricius parteth it, untill a man come to the bath of Diocletian. In circuit it containeth about foure miles, and hath no certaine forme; in so much as Varron (not without good reason) thinketh it two hills, and cutteth it into many parts.

The Viminal hill on the VVest side regardeth the Quirinal, having about a furlong space the plaine Suburralying betwene: on the North it hath the valley Quirinalis. Betwene the same hills there lyeth as it were 4 jugera in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to the Quirinal and Esquiline along the wall of the citie, by a continuall row of many arches, whereby these mountains are made even. The compasse thereof taketh up two miles and an halfe; the forme thereof is longwise, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable.

The Quirinal mount on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militarium] for the space of 4 Stadia, over-looketh the leuell plot of the citie which lyeth VVestward: but on the right hand (as cleerey appereth by that which we have said) it is opposit to the Viminalis: on the third side Northward, for the space of six Stadia, it heth to the hill called [Hortulorum.] It hath a valley lying betwene, in breadth foure jugera, reaching neere to the gate Salaria: and in the whole compasse it taketh almost three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it standeth without the old pomerie of the citie: for the space of 3 Stadia it beareth over the valley Martia, lying betwene it and Tyber. It carrieth in length along the wall of the citie, from the gate Flumentana to Collina, a full mile more than any other sides. The circumference thereof, is much about 18 Stadia.

There remaineth now the mount Ianiculus, on the other side of Tyber: the one halfe thereof and not above, is contained within the walls: from the Vatican Plaine, for the space of three Stadia, whereas it stretcheth toward the South, it adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is enclosed within the walls, for the compasse of five Stadia.

Moreover, above the Vatican plaine, there is a little hill of the same name, which putteth forth two points like hornes; the one toward Ianiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent: the convexitie or outward compasse whereof containeth a mile.

Now will we run over the plaine and bafe plot of the citie: which beginning at the Capitoll hill neere the gate Flaminia, at this day on the Northeast side (or rather the North) comprehendeth a Diameter or race almost of 8 Stadia, environed with the hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the VVest side, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the bankes thereof it beareth a greater space. Moreover, by a freight and direct line being drawne for two Stadia from the hill Hortulorum, and namely where it over-looketh the Piere of Domitian called Naumachia: along the banke of Tyberis, over-against the Pile Hadriani, it maketh a quadrangle of foure uneven sides, containing within it more than three miles: without which square is left the valley Martia, namely as much as heth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the citie, and Tyberis: so as the breadth draweth narrow or still unto the gate Flaminia.

There resteth yet the Transtiberine region, which together with the Ianiculum, taketh in compasse about 3 miles. This will be more easily observed and marked by the very channell of Tyberis; which entring into the citie, keepeth his course directly on the right hand of the gate Flaminia through the vale Martia, and soone after by little and little turneth from the North, VVestward, and representeth the forme of a semicircle, in the convexitie whereof is the Vatican, and within the concavite, the Mars field. Moreover, beneath the Moles or pile [Hadriani] returning to his former course, as farr as to the utmost foot of the Aventine, winding somewhat crooked into the South, not farr from the gate Portuensis it runneth forth of the citie.

Thus much concerning the situation and forme of Rome, and the plot wherein it standeth, which at this day is so farr changed, that hardly a man may find any token or memoriall of it, as it was in old time.

CHAP. II.

Of the founders of the citie of Rome, the KK. and inhabitants thereof.

Here region (on which Rome was after built) VVest of Tyber, a hundred and fortie furlongs distant from the sea, the Sicilians (by constant report) first inhabited. Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenotrius the sonne of Lycan, came into the said quarters: and being growne into a liking of the place for the fertilitie thereof, they expelled the the Sicilians, and held it for their owne use. In processe of time the Pelasgians, a people of Greece, together with the Thessalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines) untill the Trojan warre: but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by armes conquered that siegnorie and kingdome. Long time after, Saturne being chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son, fled into Italie: where he taught Lanus the K. of the Aborigines the skil of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the sickle: in regard of which good turne, hee was freely feoffed by Lanus in part of his realme, yea, and after the decease of Lanus enjoyed the kingdome alone. After this, the Arcadians, who tooke the citie Palantium (as wearie of their owne native countrey) and by the leading of Evander, seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth; received of Faunus the king of the Aborigines, a portion of ground; built a fort upon a little hill not farr from Tyber, and named it Palantium, in remembrance of their native citie which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnesians, Phlietians, and Epians, by reason that Elis their native countrey was wasted before by Hercules, were by him brought away into Italie, & they planted themselves upon the mount Saturnine. These men lived a long time according to their owne lawes and customes, untill they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one Communitie. Then reigned Latinius the sonne of Faunus, untill such time as Enceas the sonne of Anchises, after the overthrow and finall ruine of Ilium, after many adventures and much varietie of fortune, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the instinct of the destinies to K. Latinius. VVhose daughter Lavinia hee tooke to wife, and so was by Latinius admitted into the societie and fellowship with him of the kingdome. VVhen the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joined together, hee called both nations by the name of Latines. Then was Enceas swayed upon by Turnus; for that he had married Lavinia, who was espoused & affianced to him before. But Enceas won the victorie, and in single combat slew Turnus. At that time also Latinius died, & left his son in law Enceas heir to the crowne. Certaine yeeres after, was Enceas killed by Mezentius king of the Tuscanes; and Ascanius his sonne succeeded in the kingdome. He built the townes Lavinium and Alba: and when hee departed this life, made over the crowne to his brother Sylvius. After him followed kings, Enceas Sylvius, Latinius Sylvius, Alba, Atys, Capys, Capetus, Tyberinus, Agrippa, Romulus, Aventinus, Procas, and Amulius. This Amulius usurped the kingdome by fraud, which in right of eldership was due to his brother Numitor. And for feare lest there might arise from his brothers offspring, some one to make claime and recover the roiall seat, and thereby himselfe be thrust out of his place; he consecrated Rhea the daughter of Numitor to Vesta, for to bee a professed Nun. Shee being thus made a votarie, and devoted to perpetuall virginitie, happened to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boies, twins, namely Romulus and Remus. Amulius advertised hereof, commaunded both the babes to bee cast forth to perish. Found they were by Fausulus a shepherd upon the banke of the river Tyber, and by his wife Fausula fostered and brought up among other shepherds. Remus being grown to mans estate, was taken by certain theeves and robbers, and brought to K. Amulius his great-uncle. Accused he was, for that hee used to raise booties and drive away whole droves of Numitor his cattell. VVhereupon delivered hee was to Numitor for to bee punished according to his discretion. But Remus after much discourse of speeches to and fro, was by certaine tokens found and knowne to be Numitor his daughters son. And at the very time came Romulus also with Fausulus in place, purposing to rescue Remus his brother. Soon they entered into a conspiracie, and at unwares surprised and murdered Amulius: and so restored their grandfather Numitor. In the second yeere of Numitor his reign, Romulus and Remus built the citie of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to perish, which was the 432 yer after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose betwene Romulus and Remus striving for the soveraigntie, Remus came by his death, and then Romulus gave name both to the citie and citizens also of Rome.

CHAP. III.

The forme and bignes of the citie of Romulus.

Romulus set out the citie fouresquare, as Plutarch witnesseth: whereupon of some it is called Quadrata. Others affirme that the forme and compasse thereof is uncertaine, and by reason of Antiquitie unknowne at this day. The hill Palatinus was by Romulus first fortified, because therein he was brought up: at the foot whereof began the Pomerium. Afterwards the Capitoll and the Roman Forum were laid to it.

The citie began to be marked and bounded out from the beast-market; from whence in certaine places were stones pitched and set between, along the bottome of the mount Palatine, as far as to the altar of Consus; and so within a while to the old Curiae: then, to the chappell of the Lares & the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, until a place was assigned for the wals, and a spacious plot to build the citie upon.

Titus

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Titus Tatius began the wall from the rocke Carmentalis, and brought it to the way, which is not farre from Tyber. From thence, Southward unto the farthest part of the grand cirque: and so North-eastward hee raunged it into the Forum of Nerva, and in the end joined it to one of the points of the Capitoll hill, and within it compassed both the Capitoll it selfe, and also the Palatine. And finally to enlarge the citie, hee set to it the hills Quirinalis and Caelius.

CHAP. IIII.

The gates of Romulus his citie.

Romulus when he died, left the citie of Rome with three gates, namely Carmentalis, Romana, and Pandana. Others adde a fourth thereto, to wit, Ianualis.

Carmentalis took the name of Carmentis the mother of Evander, whose chappell Carmen-talis stood before the gate. This gate stood under the Capitoll on the right hand, betweene the cliffe Tarpeius and the Tyber, over-against the church now of S. Katherine, toward the shewplace Flaminius. This was afterwards named Scelerata, for that without this gate, in the temple of Ianus, the act of Senate passed, for the sending of the three hundred Fabij to Cremera: who went forth at this gate, and were slaine every one at Cremera.

Romana was so called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new church of S. Maria, not farre from the angle of the mount Palatine, in the bottome of the cliffe of Victoria. Some affirme, that this gate was afterwards called Mugonia, of the loowing of kine and oxen: others name it Trigonia of three corners that it had.

Pandana was so cleped, because it stood open for things to bee brought through it into the citie. The same was called Libera or Romulida. The place for it they assigned where the gate Saturnia stood, bearing the name of the old citie, so called and after destroyed.

Ianualis carried the name of the temple of Ianus, which is not far off. It stood sometime at the very foot of the hill Viminalis.

CHAP. V.

The varietie of the compasse and walls of the citie.

When the Romans one while made warre upon their neighbor nations of Italic, and otherwhiles defended themselves against their violence, it hapned for the most part that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquished any and subdued them under their subjection, in the end made them cittizens of Rome: by which occasion, the citie built by Romulus, was not sufficient to receive so great a multitude. Tullus therefore after his conquest of the Sabines and Albanes, laid to the citie the mountain Caelius and the Esquilie, & so enlarged it. Afterwards, when Policorium was woen, and a number of the inhabitants translated to Rome; Anclus made a second enlargement of the citie, and granted these new commers the mount Aventine to inhabit. The old Romanes therfore dwelt in Palatine; the Sabines in Capitolium; the Albanes in Caelius; and this new-come multitude in Aventine. But after the Latines also were received into the citie, they joined Ianiculus also to the citie by a wodden bridge made over the Tyber; and cast a trench called Fossa Quiritium, about the low & leuell places of the citie. So the Trans-tyberine quarter was united to the citie, & made it more spacious & itately: last of all, Servius Tullius by adjoining the hills Viminalis and Quirinalis to the five abovenamed, amplified the citie. And whereas before it was mounded about with rubbish, and the same rudely laid, Tarquin the proud was the first that enclosed it with a wall of good ashler stone. And the very same walls which stand at this day, were by the posteritie that followed, repaired and reedified upon the old foundations. But the citie in old time, when as it flourished in greatest glorie, extended farre more in bounds and compasse. For in Plinies time the circuit therof within the wall contained about 20 miles. But in these daies hardly 12. And the whole compasse of the citie, with the suburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they spread far, were comprehended yet under the name of citie) in the said Plinies time, was 50 miles.

CHAP. VI.

The Pomarie of the citie

That void space of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully bee either plowed or inhabited, is called Pomarie. And sometime it is put for the circuit of the whole citie. This Pomarie was oftentimes set out farther, and altered by the Roman emperours. But none had power granted so to doe, save only they that either conquered somewhat to the Romane dominion, or endowed the citie with some singular and especiall benefit; as the emperor Claudius and many more. And like as the Romanes had no certain limits of their empire, so no set bounds confined either the citie or the Pomarie.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

The gates of old Rome, which at this day are not to be seene: those also that are now extant.

ven as the bounds of the citie and Pomarium were many times altered, so the gates also; some were left within the citie, by occasion that the walls were farther set out and lost their names: others in time were so old, that they fell downe; and albeit their name remaine, yet the place where they stood is not knowne. Some againe were made new, and tooke either new names, or else kept their old: others changed the place, and held their old name: and finally, there were some that had two names; and others, more. And these in manner were all the names of the gates:

Flumentana, or Flaminia.

Numentana, or Viminalis.

Esquilina, or Taurina.

Capena, or Appia.

Tergemina, or Hostiensis.

Ratumena, or Victrina.

Carmentalis, Magonia, Pandana, Querquetulana, Raduscula, Saginalis, Saucualis, Collatina, Interaggeres, Tiburtina, Gabiola, Latina, Aurelia, Catularia, Laurentia, Fontinalis, Lavernalis, Ferentina, Minutia, Salutaris, Mutia, Piccularis, Prenestina, Libitinensis, Valeria, and Tarpeia.

Flumentana, tooke name of the river Tyberis, for it stood at the first upon the banke of that river, not far from the bridge of Xylus, in the end of the Broad street, and at the head of the way or street Flaminia: but afterwards, translated it was to the place where now it standeth. In time following, it was called Flaminia, of the causey of Flaminius: at this day it is named, The peoples gate, and is situate in the hill Hortulorum.

Collatina, bare the name of Collatia, a towne not farre from Rome: now it is Pinciana, of one Pincius a Senator, whose name it keepeth. This also standeth in the hill Hortulorum: between it and Flumentana is a mile space.

Quirinalis tooke name of the chappell of Quirinus: or because in old time the way lay through it, for that went to the hill Quirinalis. It seemeth to be called Agonensis, quasi agone, i. without a corner; afterwards, Collina: and at the last, Salaria; for that by it, salt was carried into the citie. This name it holdeth still, and standeth 6 Stadia from Collatina.

Viminalis is from Quirinalis distant 5 Stadia; so cleped as they say, of a wood of osters, which (as it is supposed) sometime grew thereby: or else, of a chappell of Imp. Viminis. This also men called Figulensis, of the potters workes made without it: but now they name it the gate of S. Agnes, and Numentana.

Interaggeres standeth in the Plaine Viminalis, betweene the gate Viminalis and Esquilina: it had the denomination of Tarquinus his mures and bankes, among which it was built.

Tiburtina, stood between Esquilina and Numentana, so as it was 12 Stadia distant from Esquilina, upon the plaine of Esquilie, in the verie place where the conduit is of the M. Anio water.

Esquilina, tooke that name of the hill Esquilie: the same in auncient time was called Taurina, of a bulles head there found: for many a day after was the said bulles head, scene painted in the inner front of the said gate. At this day, S. Lawrence gate.

Navia drew the name of certaine groves or woods neere adjoining. In times past Labicana, and now Major. An arch there was so called, and erected in the same place by the old Romanes.

Caelimontana, standing from Navia 8 Stadia, seemeth by affinitye of name to be, so called of the hill Caelius, in the edge wherof it standeth: and Afinaria it was called, of the Affes which were wont to be sent out to Naples, by that gate. At this time they call it S. Iohns gate.

Gabiola, built close to the mount Caelius, Southeast: which seemeth by all likelihood to take the name of the citie Gabij, which it directly regardeth. It carried the name also Metrodium, of measuring, and is situate from Caelimontana, as it were 5 Stadia.

Latina is 5 Stadia likewise from Gabiola, seated not farre from the church of S. Iohn Baptist: so called, for that men goe forth of it into Latium.

Capena is so named of the Capenates, a Latine nation, against which it lyeth. This also is called still Camena, of a grove and chappell of the Muses, built just before the same gate. Appia likewise, of the high-way Appia; which Appius the Cenfor paved, and so it bare his name. They call it also Triumphalis, for that in triumph the pompe is that way carried with state. Of some it is named Fontinalis, for the plentie of springs there. At this day S. Sebastians gate.

Tergemina tooke that name of an old gate so called, at which the 3 twinnes Horatij went forth against their enemies, and gave the first name to it. Some shew remaineth yet of this gate to be seene, neere the Salinae.

Hostiensis,

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Hofienfis, was in auncient daies so called, for that it led to the citie Hostia : now S. Pauls gate : situate it is from Capenaweele-neere 8 Stadia.

Portuensis is a gate beyond the Tyber, within halfe a Stadium of the said river ; so called, for that it leadeth to the haven of Hostia. Now a daies men call it, Porta ripa, i. The banke gate.

Aurelia, looketh toward Ianiculum ; distant from the former almost 7 Stadia . In this age they call it S. Pancrace gate.

Aelia, was built by Aelius Hadrianus, of whome it tooke that name.

Septimiana, bare the name of Septimius the Emperour : and because it standeth under Ianiculum, is at this day called, Subtus Ianum. Some affirme, that this is Fontinalis, because out of the mount called Aureus, there issue fountaines : for to the said hill this gate standeth close . From it to Aurelia are 5 Stadia ; and to the river Tyber 7 jugera or acres.

Thus much for the gates of the citie of Rome, and their names.

The wall in old time had upon it 360 turrets. Some of these are decayed and gone ; others repaired, and many this long time are ready to fall.

Now is it time, and the course of the storie both require, that leaving the towres and walls, we enter into the cittie, and shew the beginning and the place of those edifices, which within the walls, either upon the hills or the plaine plot of the citie, were built by men in old time. First therefore begin we will at the worthiest earthly habitation of all their gods, to wit, the Capitoll.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

The sundrie names of the Capitoll.

He Capitoll was by the old Romanes called Mount Saturnius, either of a citie named Saturnia, which under the very hill was buile in that place where now Rome standeth : or because Saturne in times past dwelt in that hill : or els (as some thinke) for that the mount it selfe had Saturne for the tutelard god and protector thereof. But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpeius, of the virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livie writeth. Last of all, Tarquinius Priscus going in hand to build upon that hill a temple to Iupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation, chaunced to find in the botome of the trench a mans head ; wherupon they called it Capitoliūm. And the Augurs being sought unto and demanded, VVhat the finding of that head might signifie ? answered, That this castle should be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This hill they divide into the castle and the Capitol. The castle they built Northward, as a stronger and more fortified place : but the Capitoll, toward Tyberis, a place naturally defended.

CHAP. II.

Who first laid the foundation of the Capitoll : who finished it : how often it was burnt, and by whome reedified.

IN the Sabine warre, Tarquinius Priscus vowed to build the Capitoll temple : but after the war was ended, so soone as he had laid the ground-workes, he died . After him, Tarquinius Superbus finished the building, of 4 square stone : and defraied the charges thereof out of the pillage of Pometia, a towne that he won. VVhen he for his tyrannie was banished Rome, Horatius Pulvillus the Consul, dedicated the said Capitoll to Iupiter. It stood upright and sound for the space of 415 yeeres, untill the Marian warres, and then (in the Consulship of Scipio and Narbo) it was consumed with fire. Sylla reedified it, and Q. Catulus consecrated it : and so it continued untill the Vitellian war. During which troubles, it was a second time burnt, at what time it stood with the doores shut, undefended, and not rifled. Vespasian built it againe ; and in his life, a third time it was destroyed by fire : and together with the Capitoll, Vespasian also himselfe died. Afterwards, Domitian rebuilded it in more magnificent and stately manner than it had been ever before, and disbursed therein above 12000 talents. Of the Capitoll turrets and pinacles, the statues and images smitten with thunderbolts and blasted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

CHAP. III.

The temple of Iup. Feretrius, of Iup. Opt. Max. of Iuno, and Minerva.

He Capitoll, Cicero calleth The house and habitation of the gods, because it contained the chappels, statues, and images in manner of all the gods : but the first of all other in Rome was that of Iupiter Feretrius, vowed by Romulus in the warre against the Ceneuians. After which war ended, and he returned to Rome with victorie, hee reared a temple in the very pitch and top of the capitoll hill. But Iupiter was by Romulus named Feretrius, as some would have it ; for that Iupiter assisted him in striking the enemy, in that verie place where he vowed the temple. Or els, because the Romanes used in making of peace, to sweare by his scepter and the flint. The rouse of this church fallen downe for verie age and through neglect of the Romanes, Augustus repaired. This temple first built by Romulus, was afterwards enlarged by Ancus Marcius.

But the temple of Iup. Opt. Max. of all other was the greatest and most renowned. This also was called Capitoliūm ; and Tarquinius Priscus vowed it. After him, Tarquinius Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of silver : but before that he finished it, he was deprived of his kingdome for his tyrannie, and left the worke unperfite to be accomplished by the Romanes. Buile it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tyberis, as hath been shewed before. For the forme, the greatnesse and beautie of this temple, read Dionysius and sundrie other authors, who have written of the Romane acts and of Rome it selfe. Vpon the top or lanternne thereof, stood Summanus the god, made of potters earth, whose head was smitten with lightning and fell into Tyberis. It had within it besides, a sanctuarie or secret chappell, which no Lay person might enter into. VVithin the said cell or chappell, were two coronets of gold : the one of them the Gauls consecrated to Iup. Opt. Maximus : the other, the Carthaginians sent to Rome in the honour of Iupiter, in token of joy for their victorie over the Samnites. Moreover, in the said temple were other three chappels, to wit, one of Iup. Opt. Max. in the mids ; a second of Minerva on the right hand ; and a third of Iuno on the left. And because men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was set downe in writing, That the chiefe and highest Pretour for the time being, should drive a spike or great naile neere unto her image, whereby the computation of the yeeres might be knownen. This so rich and costly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitellian warre. Now at this day the place wheras it stood, is prophane : howbeit there remaine yet to be seene, some tokens thereof, and the foundations ; but all deformed and broken peece meale.

CHAP. IIII.

The temples of Saturne, Iupiter Tonans, Iupiter Custos, of Fortune, of Vejovis, Mercie, Iuno Moneta, and of Ianus. The sepulchre of Orestes, the common Tresurie, the house of Manlius, and chappell of Carmenta.

INce that we have described the temple of Iupiter K. of the gods, in what place it was situate, and by whome built ; meet it is to make report also of other gods in order, who had their houses in the Capitoll : and first of Saturne, Iupiters father.

Saturne in old time had an altar erected unto him in the verie way as ye goe out of the Forum up to the Capitoll, as some thinke. There be, that would have this temple or altar of Saturne, built by the companions of Hercules : others againe say, that Tatius reared it. But of this varietie in opinion of VVriters, this may be the reason, because some affirme, that there were two temples consecrated to Saturne, but reared in divers places and at severall times : one at the rocke of Carmenta, even before the Capitoline cliffe (wherein the bones also of Orestes brought from Aricia were bestowed) : the other in that very place, where now standeth the chappell of S. Saviour : where yet at this day there is a turret to be seene, which they call, the tower in Erarium : for there first was the common treasure house of Rome. In the temple of Saturne, dedicated by Catulus Lutatius, there stood Ianus with four faces ; signifying the four times of the yeere : of whome the first moneth Ianuarie tooke name.

The temple of Iupiter Tonans, Augustus Caesar first built, on the Capitoline cliffe or side of the hill, Southeast ; upon this occasion : It happened, that in the Cantabrian expedition, as hee was carried by night in a litter, the lightning slightly glauced thereupon, and killed the servant that was the guide ; and therefore he both vowed this temple, and also finished it to the honour of Thundring Iupiter. A temple also to Fortune was built not farre from it.

The temple of Vejovis, stood betweene the castle and the Capitoll, in that part where now the chappels are to be seene of Conservatores. In old time they called this Idoll-devill, Vejovis, because he was deprived of all power to helpe and doe good. To him they sacrificed a shee goat : because hee held arrows in his hand, most men thought he was Apollo.

Asylum, that is to say, the temple of Mercie stood likewise upon the Capitoll hill, neere a shadowie grove, in the very valley amid the Capitoll and the castle. Called it is the temple Intermontium, between two oke rowes. This Romulus erected; that what offender soever thither fled, he should be privileged as in a sanctuary. But Tyberius afterwards, supposing that this place ministered occasion of mischief, deprived it of that libertie. This Asylum, by report, the posteritie of Hercules first erected.

The temple (as also the mint-house) of Iuno Moneta, was built upon that plot of ground, where sometime stood the house of M. Manlius. This chappell, some report that L. Furius vowed; others, that L. Cicervius the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Iuno called Moneta, of giving warning; for that from the verie place where afterwards the temple was set, there was a voice heard of Iuno, admonishing them of the future overthrow by the Senones. In this place now standeth a Senators house of Rome.

The temple of Ianus keeper of the Capitoline castle, stood in that place, where at this day is the goale and prison for malefactors and fellows, toward the Southwest, over-against the Forum Romanum. This Ianus upon the Capitoll, Romulus and Tatius devised to have two faces, representing thereby the two nations. Others would have him to be pourtraied a faced, for his cunning and providence: for he was the first that invented the [roiall] crown; also boats; the skill of navigation; brasen coine, and many other things. Ianus tooke that name ab eundo, of going, for that he turneth about the heaven and all things els. For which cause he is also named Vertumnus: In old time they beleevd there was but one Ianus; but the posteritie in later age, have imagined more.

The temple of Iupiter Custos, Domitian (after hee was invested in the empire) built: and placed his owne image in the lap and bosome of that god. It stood where at this day the Saline or salt pits are, neere the temple of Ianus.

CHAP. V.

The temples of gods which have no certaine place now in the Capitoll.

AMong those gods, whose determinate place assigned to them in the Capitoll, is not knowne where it was, the first was Terminus, as to whom in all the world throughout, there is no proper place appointed. Now this Terminus was a rude & formlesse stone. Vnto him Tatius first vowed a temple: and some say, that Numa dedicated it. How ever it be; no doubt, verie ancient it was, as easily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitoll was of men in old time reputed for a god, this was the cause: VVhen Tarquinius Superbus determined to build a temple to Iupiter, he consulted with the Augures about the place, because he would begin nothing without the approbation of the birds. They shewed unto him the mount Tarpeius: but this place was already taken up with other gods, whose chappels there, were consecrated and hallowed. These therefore were by certaine sacrifices to be conjured out from thence, for to give way unto Iupiter, and to be translated into some other quarter. All the gods willingly yeelded their places up to Iupiter as their King. only Terminus refused to be displaced; and so remained there still. VVhen he had finished the temple, that fore-part of the rouse which regardeth the said stone, was left naked & open for that god, as who neither ought nor could be enclosed. The augures therefore being sought unto and demanded, For what reason Terminus alone abode still with Iupiter, when all the other gods were gone? made answer, that thereby was signified, that together with religion, their empire also was eternall. To this god they sacrificed not but in open aire and publickly abroad, as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Augustine witnesseth, that Mars also and Iulianus together with Terminus, would not agree, to give place unto Iupiter: for that the dominion of Rome should not be bounded out, ne yet decay with age and continuance of time.

To Mars and Venus Erycina, Atilius and Q. Fab. Max. being Duumvirs, dedicated chappels upon the Capitoll, severd asunder by one vault or cistern.

To queene Iuno, Cn. Flaminius in the Ligurian warre, vowed a temple.

To Ops, Tatius the King, consecrated a temple; for that shee is called the earth, and is the mother of all things; as bringing forth all, and receiving all again. The same Ops is called Mai, Fauna, and Bona Dea. This temple was blasted with fire from heaven, as Livie testifieth.

To Mars revenger, Augustus Caesar erected a temple upon the Capitoll, within the hill Saturnius.

To Faith, on the same hill, Atilius Collatinus dedicated another.

To Health, Concord, Libertie, and Victorie, they built temples: and many there were within the citie erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Primiigenia and Obsequens, Tullus dedicated a temple.

To Venus bald, they set up also a temple in the Capitoll, in memoriall and everlasting praise of the Romane dames, for willingly parting with the haire from their heads, toward the making of engines that that during the Gauls warre, were devised and made against the enemies.

Tarquinius Superbus built a temple to Iupiter Sponsor, and Sp. Posthumius dedicated it. Likewise to Iupiter Piflor, the old Romans consecrated a temple in the Capitoll.

The baker.*

CHAP. VI.

Of the statues which either in old time were, or now remaine in the Capitoll.

IF statues in old time were sundrie sorts, and the same made of divers matter: some of marble, some of brasie, some of silver, and others of gold. Many of these were set up in the capitoll to the immortal gods for divers causes, and namely, for their benefits bestowed upon mankind; which along time were honoured and worshipped. To noble men likewise and such as had deserved well of the common-weale, the usuall manner was in old time to set up statues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to doe the like.

To Iupiter in the Capitoll, Sp. Carvilius erected a statue in his temple, after he had vanquished the Samnites, taking the proportion and forme thereof by the patterne of Iupiter Latarius his image. Florus maketh mention, that this statue was smitten with lightning. He also set up another to Thundering Iupiter.

The old Romans set up in the temple of Imp. Opt. Max. statues to Victorie and Faith, to either of them one.

For Nemesis also, was an image erected in the Capitoll, for that this goddesse punisheth proud and faithlesse persons. Shee is named also Rhamnusia of Rhamnus a village in Attica, where shee was worshipped: and Adraste, of Adrastus who was the first that built a temple in the honour of her.

Vnto Hercules, for his notable and famous actes, they erected many statues in the Capitoll: and namely, Pub. Sulpitius and Pub. Sempronius one; and Q. Fabius Max. another, which he brought from the Tarentines by him subdued.

The images of good Event, and good Fortune (the workmanship both of Praxiteles) were within the Capitoll.

The image of Apollo with a diademe, and his Colossus thirtie cubits high: in the making whereof were bestowed 140 talents, Lucullus translated out of Apollonia in Pontus, into the Capitoll.

An image there was of Ianus likewise in the capitoll, holding in his right hand the number of 300, and in his left of 65, to signifie the daies of the yeere.

Two golden statues of Castor and Pollux, were by the Emperour Claudius of famous memorie, dedicated in the temple of Iupiter.

The counterfeits resembling the rivers, Nilus and Tygris, halfe naked, were set up in the forefront of the temples of Conservatores: the one carie upon the shoulders, Sphinx; the other a Tygre; two wild beafts: both of them hold in their right hand Cornucopia, which signifieth plentie.

The pernage of Hercules pourtraied naked, of brasie and double guilt, without beard, holding in his right hand a club, and in the left the golden apples of the Hesperides, was found neere the Greeke schoole and the beast-market, in the ruines of Ara maxima.

There be certaine portraitures also of the Parthian and Dacian triumphs, enclosed within walls, which were taken out of the church now called S. Martina.

CHAP. VII.

Statues of famous and noble men set up in the Capitoll.

IO Scipio they erected in the capitoll, a statue wearing a soldiars cassock and slippers or pantofles, in regard of his victorie over Antiochus, for an everlasting memoriall of his worthie deeds. To Sylla there was also a statue erected in the Capitoll, in habit of a footman.

For Aemilius Lepidus, when he was but a boy, the people of Rome set up a statue, because hee had in battaile vanquished an enemy, and saved a citizen.

The like honour to the rest they did to Metellus, for that hee had preserved out of the temple of Vesta being on fire, the image of Pallas.

They erected an image unto Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi, in recompence of a benefit of hers, for that in a great dearth of corne, she served the people at 3 farthings a Modius. The same they did to Trebius the Edile.

Fabius Maximus made for himselfe a cast or molten image, and erected it just by that of Hercules.

Vnto Brutus, for delivering Rome from the tyrannie of Tarquinius, the Romans erected his image in the mids of the KK. statues.

Domitian

*Cum chlamide & crepundis: but for [crepundis] read [crepidis] Rabinio: signifying the Greekish and Asian habit: for the Romane statues were Togatz.

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Domitian would not suffer any image of his to be erected, unless it were of molten silver or gold, and of a certaine weight.

The emperor Commodus tooke off the head from the colosse of Nero, and set it upon his owne statue which he had in the Capitoll. This Colossus is to be seene broken as it was, in the houses of Conservatores.

In the said houses of Conservatores, is extant yet the brassen portraiture of a shee wolfe, at whose teats, Romulus and Remus, the first founders of Rome, are to be seene how they hang suckling.

The images of Romulus and Remus remained in the Capitoll, resembling two youthes; the one, standing upon the feet in servile habit and attire: the other sitting like a shepherd or heardman, bending forward with his bodie, plucking a thorne out of the sole of his foot, which ranckled and fettered withall.

An infinite number of statues were in the Capitoll, of gods especially, brought from other parts to Rome. For the Romanes robbed the Churches of forreyn nations, for to enrich and adorne their owne.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Capitoll cliffe, Tarpeia rocke, the stone of Carmentis, and the gate Stercoraria.

IN old time, they called that place and way whereby men goe up to the Capitoll, Clivus Capitolinus: but where that place was in times past, sundrie opinions there be. Some affirme, that it lay toward that part of the hill which looketh to the Aventine, where now standeth S. Gregories Church in Velabrum: others, betwene the temples of Saturnus and Concordia, neere to the arch of Severus, and at the stalls or standings, called Senatoris itabula. Now this arch of Severus, was raised at the foot of the Capitoll hill, in the verie head and top of Forum Romanum: under which they passed, that in triumph ascended up to the Capitoll. The Capitoll cliffe then, was neere unto the Romane Forum; which by the Censors was paved with flint: who also set up a gallerie from the chappell of Saturne unto the Capitoll temple close to the Senaculum, and the Curia over it. Corn. Tacitus writeth, that in former times there were many avenues and waies up to the Capitoll, and thereupon arose so many and divers opinions concerning the Clivus Capitolinus. In that place, the feast Floralia was in old time celebrated, wherof some tokens remaine at this day to be seene. In it stood Milvius house, which was full of shields and other armour, as Cicero maketh report.

That place was called Tarpey rocke, which standeth over the Forum Romanum: from whence in times past felonious malefactors found guiltie, were pitched downe headlong, and wherein at this day offenders are punished.

Carmentis stone, regardeth Tyberis, just over-against the Senatours bridge.

The Dung-gate called Stercoraria, stood upon the Capitoll cliffe aforesaid; thither was thrown out all the filth rid out of the temple of Vesta, for to be carried away and soone after to be cast into the Tyberis.

CHAP. IX.

Of tables, of brassen columnes or pillars, and of the silver goose.

IN the Capitoll there were two sorts of tables; the one, of pictures, containing the noble acts or battailes, with the siege and assault of cities, exploited by valiant martiall men. For some of them were so desirous of praise and renowne, that they could not be content to behold their owne statues erected in the capitoll, unless their acts were described also, and depicted in tables set up in publicke place; and by that meanes left their glorie behind them, recommended likewise to posteritie. Another kind there was of tables, wherein were written the most ancient lawes, to wit, of Romulus, Numa, and the other Kings. Likewise the statutes of the later lawgivers: the publicke acts and ordinances; the leagues and covenants with other nations; the sacred rites of divine service, and the ancient records and monuments, which were engraven and cut in brassen tables: of which, some at this day are extant; others by continuance of time, by warre, fire, and carelesse negligence are lost and perished. For the keeping of these, there were certaine persons appointed, that in so serious and important matters, there should be no forgery and corruption.

Pillars likewise of brasse, were by Domitian set up in the capitoll; the which, Augustus the conqueror of Egypt, caused (of many brassen beakeheads of ships molten together) to be made into four huge columnes, and brought them to Rome. Sylla likewise tooke out of Iupiters temple in Athens, certain brassen pillars, brought them to Rome, and there consecrated them to Iupiter in the capitoll.

The portraiture of a goose in silver, was set up within the castle by the Romanes for perpetuall memorie, memorie, because a goose by gagging gave warning of the enemies comming, to the warders of the castle, and thereby saved the Capitoll. For which cause geese a long time after, were fed and kept in Rome at the cities charges. There are besides, many other antiquities within the Capitoll, cut in tables of brasse and marble both, and namely Epitaphies, which here for brevities sake are left out.

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

CHAP. X.

Of certaine edifices and buildings upon the Capitoll hill, and of other things in generall.

NOW that we have made declaration of the statues, tables, and columnes, worth the noting: something by the way would be said in this place, as touching the auncient houses there.

The court called Calabra Curia, Romulus built in the Capitoll, and covered it with reed. In to this place the king-sacrificer was wont to assemble the Senate and people of Rome, that from him they might learne and know the dayes of solemne games, playes, and sacrifices.

Not farre from the said Curia, was the cottage of Romulus.

And almost in the same place stood the stately porch or gallerie of Metellus and Constantinus. The Librarie also called Majorum, built most artificially upon marble pillars: and besides, the publicke court-yard.

There was an hallowed place likewise upon the Capitoll, from whence they gathered Verbena, or sacred hearbs, to make gairlands for the faciaall heralds and the Paterpatratus: wherewith they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaime warre.

The flint stone also was here found, which they held in their hand when they swore by Iupiter, pronouncing these words, If I made default with my knowledge, then let Dispieter cast me out of all that I have (sparing the citie and the castle) as I hurle from me this stone.

The Capitoll had certaine vaults like cisternes, into which were throwne all things over-worne, or so old, that they were good for nothing. The fixe steeds drawing in one teeme, were there to be seene, which Cneus Cornelius set up. The twelve gilded shields likewise, made of thar money wherein the Ediles condemned and fined the corne-mudgins that hounded and kept in their corne. The shield also of Marius, set out with the image of Ashurball; and the columnne garnished with ship beake-heads of brasse, wherof Livy speaketh, were here to be seene. Within the temple of Iupiter Capitolinus there was a short cloake or mantle of purple woollen, to which, if other purple garments were laid, they shewed the colour of ashes in regard of the excellent bright glosse and lustre that it caried. A present this was (by report) given to Amelians by a Persian king, who had it from the farthest Indians. The lintell, cheekes and sill of the Capitoll dore, were made all of brasse. The brassen tiles likewise upon the rooffe, Q. Catulus gilded all over. The place where Numa tooke his auguries was on the Capitoll; but Tatius used rather the castle cliffe: where also stood sometime the house of Manlius, but afterward, thereupon was built the chappell of Imo Moneta. The bookes also of Sibylla were kept in the temple of Iupiter Capitolinus, by tenne VVardens, in a stone coffer under the ground. Over and besides so many edifices were there, so beautifull was the Capitoll, and the riches thereof so great, so many goodly ornaments & shrines of the gods most artificially wrought, that right worthily of men in old time, it was called the earthly habitation of the gods and of Iupiter himselfe. For during the upright and flourishing state of Rome; so curiously built and richly beautified it was: that as heaven surpasseth the earth, so farre this edifice went beyond all other workes and wondrous whatsoever of the world; in so much as it seemed to have been built by the gods: so farre surmounted it all the devise and reach of mans wit. But as excellent as these things sometimes were, now at this day they are to be seene, all naked, forlorne, and desolate.

CHAP. XI.

The temples of Concord, and Iupiter Stator: moreover what the Curia is.

BETWEENE the Capitoll hill and mount Palatine, there lyeth a valley, whereof wee have spoken before. The temples and buildings whereof, as also the places behind the Capitoll, by order and course we are now to describe. In this valley therefore the temple of Concord deserveth to be visited first: which word, being derived (as it were) from the unitie and agreement of heart, maintaineth, augmenteth, and preserveth alone, all things in the world whatsoever.

A temple to this Concord, Camilus vowed, in case hee could reconcile the Commons to the Nobles. VVhen as therfore the people was brought into grace and favour againe with the nobilitie, he built the church of Concord, beginning above the Comitium and so forward unto the Forum. The porches belonging to this temple, are yet to be seene at the foot of the Capitoll. From it, there was an ascent of an hundred steps up to the chappell of Luna, Maneta. That temple of Concord, fallen in long time to decay, was afterwards by the Senat reedified. Therein many a time the Senat met and late in counsell, and orations were made unto the peeple. In this also there was a yaile or shroud under the ground, wherein oftentimes thieves, armed men, cutters and hacksters were kept as in a prison, untill the assemblies of the peeple were dismissed. This house had many statues and images, curiously and cunningly wrought, namely, of Luna, Apollo, and of Latoia, bearing and holding her two babes Apollo and Diana. Likewise of Asculapius and Hygie, the handy worke of Nicoratus. Also of Iupiter, Ceres, and Minerva: likewise of the Dames weeping and adoring the said images; all made by Stenes. Moreover, the images of Mars and Mercurie; the workmanship of Piscicutes. Also of Mosyas bound, made by Zencis the painter. Likewise father Liber and Cassandra, painted by Theodorus. As for the image of Vesta in the porch and entrance of the said temple, it is to be seen how it was smitten with a thunderbolt.

To Iupiter Stator, Romulus in the Sabine warre vowed a temple, that he might stay the flight of the Romanes: whereupon he was called, The upholder of the Romane state. Therefore after victorie obtained, he built a temple at the foot of the Palatine hill, just over-against the church of Concordia, where at this day be most high battlements of walles. In this house also, like as in that other of Concordia, the Senate assembled oft. Likewise in other temples. The courts, wherein the Senate gathered together in counsell, were temples all, and therein were the acts made: but in the sacred churches of the gods, neither met the Senat, nor any orations were made to the people. This temple of Stator was burnt to the ground in that fire of Neroes making, and never after reedified.

CHAP. XII.

The temple and grove of Vesta: the temple of Faith and of Romulus.

The temple of Vesta was built by Romulus, betweene the Capitoll and the Palatine hills, not far from the Forum Romanum; where at this day is to be seene, the church of S. Marie of graces. Neere unto it the pallace of Numa was built. The Romane Pontifices, when they would confoule of great matters concerning religion, met in the court-yard of Vesta; like as the Senat and people of Rome, debated in counsaile of their weightiest affaires within the temple of Faith. Now this was a most auncient temple built in Palatium by Romulus, or as some will have it, by Numa.

There was a grove also consecrated to Vesta, which reached from the roote of the Palatine, as far as to the large street called Nova via. Out of that grove (before Rome was taken by the Gaules) a voice was heard, giving warning, That the citie should be lost, unless the walles and gates were repaired.

The temple of Romulus was seated at the foot of mount Palatine, in the mids of that side which regardeth the Capitoll, in that very place where now the church is of S. Theodore. In this said temple there is a most auncient monument, The pourtrature of the shee wolfe, yecljing her teares unto the founders of the citie, to be suckd.

CHAP. XIII.

Lupercal, and the figtree Ruminalis.

This Lupercal was a cave at the botome of the Palatine hill, overspread and covered with trees; having springs deepe beneath under the rocke. In the most inward and secret place of this cave, there was an altar consecrated to Pan. But as touching the etymologie and derivation of the name, as also of the situation thereof, there goe divers opinions: For as in times past the place was close hidden and unfrequented, so now it is inhabited on every side; in so much as there remaineth no marke and token at all where Lupercal was. Howbeit the greater part of writers affirme, that it was in that quarter of the citie, where at this day S. Theodors church is seene. For to this place upon a time the Tybre overflowing, made a creeke thither: and hard by it was, where the two infants were cast forth. In the Lupercal therefore, certaine authors confidently avouch, that Romulus and Remus were laid to perish, and so carried by water to the place called afterwards Ruminalis, where under a fig-tree there, nourished by a shee wolfe. This wolfe haunted and kept in the denne called Lupercal, and from thence ranne to the banke side under the figge-tree Ruminalis, for to suckle the said babes, and so gave the name unto the cave to be called Lupercal, as it were the lurking hole and denne of the wolfe. There be againe that would have Evander to give the name to the same hollow cave: for he, as is before declared, was descended from Arcadia, where the people after most auncient rites and ceremonies, doe right devoutly worship Pan, the god of heard-men.

men. Vnto whom also a mountaine in Arcadia to him dedicated, was called Lycæus, for that he keepeth wolves from the sheepe, and preserveth the flockes and heards. This Evander therefore comming upon a time into Italie, and resting in these parts, consecrated both this grove and cave to Pan, and according to the manner of his countrey, there honoured him. In the said cave therefore reared was an altar, and a goat thereupon sacrificed unto him, as to the god and preserver of the flockes: and seeing that he chaſeth wolves from them, therefore the place wherein he was worshipped tooke the name Lupercal.

Now the feast Lupercalia was by Romulus and Remus instituted. For they having obtained of Numitor a plot of ground to build them a citie on, in that very place where they had been cast forth; called all their companions to a feast and merrie meeting: where, after they had killed sacrifices, and refreshed themselves with meat, and withall taken their wine liberally to the full, they grew to disport, and in that merie fit clad themselves in the skins of the goats which they had sacrificed, and then fell to hopping and dauncing full jocundly. Hereupon their posteritie, celebrating the memoriall thereof, held a festivall solemnitie called Lupercalia, which retained the name of the place where first they began. Hereof see more in Valerius Maximus, Servius, and Plutarch in the life of Antoninus. As for the fig-tree Ruminalis, it was so cleaped of the river Tyber, called at the first Rumion. Some would have it take the name of Romulus. Others of the milke given to the said infants, for that part of the throat which draweth milke, is called Ruma in Latine. This place was overagainst the house of the two lords, Cosinus and Damianus, on the side of the mount Palatine, opposit against the grand race or shew-place, called Circus Maximus. Romulus and Remus thus laid forth about Lupercal, and carried by the water, to this place, were fostered for a while under the figtree Ruminalis, in the place where the Comitium after was. The tokens of this tree remained unto the time of Augustus Cesar, as Ovid testifieth.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the New way, the streets Iugarius, and Tuscan.

The street called the New way overagainst the temple of Iupiter Stator, goeth along the valley betweene the Capitoll hill and the Palatine, and reacheth to the Forum Romanum. This, howsoever it be called New, was well known to be most auncient, and is different from that, which Caracalla repaired under his baines.

The street Iugarius, otherwise called Thurarius, leadeth from the gate Carmentalis, along the foot of the Capitoll hill, to the Forum Romanum. In it was the altar of Iuno Iuga, who was thought to make mariages, and to couple folke in matrimonies, and she it was that gave the name to Vicus Iugarius.

Vicus Thuscus beginneth at the Forum, and along the foot of the Palatine sheweth the way to Velabrum. The reason of the name is this. The Tuscans upon a time fighting against the Aricians, were by them overcome; and after many thousands of them slaine in battell, the rest being few in number fled to Rome: who taking delight in the pleasant seat of the citie, and the commodiounesse of the place, determined there to remain. VVherupon having a plot of foure stadia granted them by the Senat, betweene the Capitoll and Palatine, they inhabited the same. Hereupon the street was called by them Thuscus Vicus, and many a hundred yeer after retained that name. In it afterwards there kept bawds and such kind of people, whereupon it grew out of credite, and lost also the first name.

CHAP. XV.

The Arches of Romulus, the Senaculum, and the dwelling house of Ovid.

The old arches (which some thinke Romulus erected) continued a long time built of bricke, neither would the Romanes suffer that any man should make them of marble: so the end, that the memoriall of their citie founder, should remaine more firmly in the minds of men. But in continuance of time long after, they decayed and fell downe, in that very place where now is the church of Saint Marie of Grace, and were never afterwards reedified. The Romanes named that place Senaculum, betweene the Capitoll and the Forum, wherein the Senate kept a consistorie for counsell and consultation.

That Ovids mansion house stood under the Capitoll, himselfe witnesseth, even where as now the church is of S. Marie of Consolation.

Thus much of the buildings of the Capitoll and the valley to it. Now followeth the mount Palatine.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

The divers etymologies of Palatine.

Albeit the hill Palatine were a long time inhabited before the citie was built, and namely, first by Valentia the daughter of Italus; then, by Evander, who also therein set up a castle: whome there succeeded after the citie was founded, KK. and Emperors; inasmuch as scarcely any one place of Rome is more renowned by writing, than this hill: yet the certain reason of the name why it should be so called, & which a man may be bold to follow, can hardly be set downe. Some would have it so called, because the Arcadians wandering with Evander disorderly, and the Palatines out of the Rheatine territorie (called likewise Palatium) came to that mount and it inhabited: others of Palas the great grandfather of Evander. Livie thought, that of Palanteum a citie of Arcadia, it was first called Palantium, and afterward Palatine. There are besides, who of Palatia the wife of Latinius, fetch the originall of the denomination: or of Palatho, the daughter of Hyperboreus, who bare Latinius unto Hercules, and inhabited this mountaine: or of Palantia the daughter of Evander, who there was buried: or of Palas, who was himselfe interred in it. Some there are also, who of the bleating of sheepe, which pastured there in times past, before the hill was by men frequented and peopled, imagine it was so named: or else because flocks were wont there palare, that is, to wander and graze up and downe. And hereupon it is, that Nervius called it Balantium, of Balarus; or Palantium, of palaree. Tremellius calleth it the mount Rumuleus, of Romulus his image, found at the very foot of the said hill. This may suffice for the derivation of the name.

* Beletus, i.
Bleating.

CHAP. II.

The temple of Victorie, Ceres, Iuno Sospita, and the mother of the gods: the temple of Libertie and the porch thereof, as also the house of Cassius.

Now that we have declared the reason of the name of Palatium; we will goe forward to shew the temples and houses of the said mountaine, like as we have done in the description of the Capitoll hill.

VVhen the Romans had performed fortunatly many martiall exploits, and oftentimes returned with victorie over their enemies, because they would not bee found unthankfull to the gods, unto whom they were beholden for their happie achievements, and thereby afterwards misse of the like fortunate successe; they consecrated unto the goddesse Victorie a temple in that part of the Palatine, which looketh toward the hortyards and gardens of Maria Nova, in the verie botome of the descent, hard at the gate Romana. L. Posthumus an Edile Curule tooke order for the building thereof, out of certain money raised by fines and penalties; and when it was finished, he dedicated it to the goddesse Victoria.

Near thereto was a chappell, consecrated to virgin Victoria, which M. Porcius Cato vowed.

Besides, in the same place was the temple of Iuno Sospita.

The Arcadians, which with Evander came to the Palatine hill, built a temple also in Palatium to Vesta, but as different from this above-named, as farre more ancient: and to the honor of that goddesse, solemnized yeerely sacrifices.

They built a temple to Ceres also in the Palatine.

In the farrall bookes of Sibylla there was a prophesie found, That the forreine enemy and straunge borne should be chased out of Italie, in case the mother of the gods might be brought to Rome from Peisinus. Now a stone it was, which the inhabitants of that countrey so called. Sent therefore were embassadours into Asia as far as to Peisinus a towne of Phrygia: who brought with them that Great mother of the gods into Italie. Then P. Cornelius carried it from the sea into the Palatine, and bestowed it in the temple of Victorie, until such time as one was built of purpose for her. Afterward, M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, tooke order for a temple to be made, to this great mother of the gods, and the same set out with statues, pillars, and pavements of divers stones of great price. And Iunius Bruttus dedicated it. The plaies also and games called Megalicia, whereof Cicero speaketh, were first instituted at the dedication thereof.

Vnto

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Vnto Libertie, P. Clodius built a temple and a stately gallerie, in part of Cassius his house, neere the temple of Iupiter Stator.

CHAP. III.

*Of the chappell and altar of * Febris: the temple of the Lares: the chappell of the goddesse Viriplaca, of Faith, and Iupiter Victor.*

* The fever.

Not to those gods only that did good to mankind the Romanes consecrated temples, but dedicated chappels to those also that did them hurt; to the end, that they should do lesse harme, and punish them more gently. For certain it is, that on the hill Palatine there was a temple and altar both, consecrated to the Fever: likewise to Nemesis the goddesse of vengeance; wherof before in the second booke.

Besides, they erected a chappell of the Lares in the Palatine.

In like manner, there was a chappell in the Palatine, consecrated to the goddesse Viriplaca; into which, if man and wife came together, although they disagreed and were fallen out before, they returned homie againe good friends from thence, and all was well.

After that Aeneas with his sonne Ascanius and daughter Roma came into Italie, they reared a temple to Faith, in Palatine: the which was dedicated notwithstanding in the name of the daughter, and the same was written in the forefront of the temple: and therefore many yeeres after, when Romulus and Remus strove who should give name to the citie, the Senat and people of Rome reading the name of Aeneas his daughter in the frontispice of the said temple, resolved to name the city after her, Roma.

Q. Fabius in the Sabine warre, vowed a temple to Iupiter conqueror: and afterwards built it on the Palatine hill, and there dedicated it.

CHAP. IIII.

The temples of Heliogabalus, Apollo, and the Penates: the house of Orcus; the place of the Palladium or image of Minerva; and the temple of Augustus.

Antonius Heliogabalus consecrated a god in the mount Palatine, which hee called Heliogabalus, and built a temple in the verie place, where before stood that of Orcus or Pluto. But to win credit and name to this new & counterfeit god with great reverence and worship; he endeavoured to translate into this temple of his, the sacred cup of that great mother of the gods, the fire of Vesta, the image of Minerva called Palladium, the heavenly scutcheons, and all things else which the Romanes honoured above the rest. The Christian and Iewish religion also he there counterfeited, to the end, that no man in the religious worship of that temple and god, might alledge any pretence why hee should not with good conscience so doe.

Moreover, in the Palatine, there was built almost auncient temple of Apollo. This chaunced to be overthrowne by thunder and lightning; and when the soothsaiers gave out, that the god misse it and required another, Augustus Caesar adjoynd a porch to the ruines thereof, and reedified the temple anew that there stood: wherein himselfe when hee grew aged, many a time sat in counsell with the Senat, and empanelled the decuries of judges. In it likewise were pendant candlesticks, braunth with armes like trees, whereon the approved poets bestowed their writings. Certaine markes and tokens of this temple are to be seene (although obscurely) neere to the vineyard of Fedius, where the house of Tiberius stood. Vnto him were instituted the Apollinare games, whereof read Cicero.

The temple of the citie-protectours, called Penates, stood in that part of the Palatine which looketh into the North, even on Velia not farre from the Forum. In it were the images of the Trojane gods. In the same are pourtraied two young men sitting together, and holding a ball in their hand. In like manner, the crooked Augurs staves called Litui, of iron and brasle. Besides, an earthen Trojane vessell of potters worke. Apollo also and Neptune were there to be seene.

VVhen the temple of Vesta was on a light burning fire, the image of Pallas being saved out thereof, was translated into Velia, and gave the name unto the temple of Palaca, now S. Andrews church, standing in the same place.

Some report, that there was a temple built in Palatium to Augustus Caesar of famous memorie, by his daughter Livia.

CHAP. V.

The Palatine houses, and the court of the Salij.

That Romulus and Remus being shepheards abode sometime in these parts, the sheds and cottages, which long time after were found here, made of slight wood and reed, doe testifie: which as any of them in continuance of time decayed and fell downe, the shepheards repaired with the like matter to their auncient forme, that the perpetuall memoriall of Romulus and Remus

the

the citie founders, what kind of persons they were, and what manner of houses they woned in, might be delivered to posteritie. In that corner of the Palatine hill, which leadeth into the grand cirque or shew-place, there stood (many ages) the cottage which they called Casa Romuli.

Tullus Hostilius, before he built his court dwelt upon Velia, in that verie place where afterwards the chappell of the Penates stood.

Not farre from thence, even in that part of the Palatine which regardeth the Forum, Caesars (by report) had his house built.

Moreover, betweene M. Scaurus his house and Caesars, there was but a small step over.

Ciceros house purchased of Crassus, was in the most frequent and conspicuous place of the mount Palatine, above the church of Imp. Statius, neere the Palatium.

Plinius testifieth, how the houses of Crassus the orator, and Vitellius, in the Palatium, were in old time overturned.

One captaine Vannus likewise had an house in the Palatium.

Albius Tiberius, whereof we have written in the former chapter.

Augustus (borne in the region about Palatium, in a place called Capita bubula, i. the ox heads; and where after his death, they erected a chappell unto him) dwelt first neere the Romane Forum, above the round staires called Scala annularia, in the house sometime of Calvus the orator. Afterwards he built the stately Palatine at his owne charges and gave it to the city, and himselfe dwelt on the Palatine hill in the small house of Hortensius.

The Guild, or religious court of the Salii, built in the mount Palatine, chaunced to be burnt; and in the ashes thereof, the staffe of Romulus called Lituus was found, without any hurt.

Publius dwelt in an house standing over the Forum, which was called Subvelia.

That the dwelling house of Tarquinius Priscus was neere unto the temple of Imp. Statius, may soone be proved out of Livie.

CHAP. VI.

Of the top of Velia; the statues in Palatine, and other things in generall.

THe pitch of the hill called Summa Velia, was in that higher part of Palatium, which looketh into the Southeast, whereas now is the temple of Mariae the new. Called Velia it was, because in old time before the devise of shearing sheepe, the shepheards were there wont to plucke the wooll from the sheeps backe.

Augustus set up a Librarie of Latine and Greeke bookes in Palatine, and adorned it with the money raised of the most excellent brasie of that huge colossus of Thuscan Apollo. He adjoynd thereto a porch or gallerie, which they called Palatium.

In it was erected by the Senate, a statue unto Numerianus the Emperour, and a singular oratorie.

In the same porch, the Romanes also set up a statue unto M. Varo, while he lived.

The Auguratorium, which was a place where they used to take auguries, was upon mount Palatin.

Apollo Palatinus likewise, the workmanship of Scopas, was in Palatium. Latona in the same was placed.

Titus the Emperour set up a golden statue in Palatine to Britannicus.

Moreover, the tree which grew out of Romulus his speare, was in the Palatium. For hee, after he had taken his auguries in the mount Aventine, launced his speare from him into the Palatine, which sticking in the earth, budded forth leaves and grew to be a tree.

Likewise the bay tree, which the same day that Augustus was borne, sprung with him and suddainly appeared, was in Palatium. Of this laurell tree, they that afterwards triumphed, were wont to wear their wreathed guirlands.

The Palatine baines, whereof Cicero maketh mention in his oration for Roscius, were in the same Palatium; and of them there remaine yet some tokens, above the Circus max. not far from the vineyard of Fedra.

In the same mountaine also there was a place called Sicilia, and Iupiters parlour.

The most beautifull streets called Antoniana, paved with Lacedaemonian and Porphyret stones, were in Palatium. The streets also of Padus, and Fortuna respiciens, were to be scene in Palatine. And there were the games and pastimes celebrated, which they call Palatual.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Greater: the court-yard of the Palatium: and the old gate of the very Palatium it selfe.

HOW great a compasse the Palatium tooke up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how rich, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruines, the pictures, statues, and most pretious pillars there there found, do easily declare. For no man ever hath left in writing, who first built so great and stately edifices; who afterwards enlarged the same, and in so conspicuous a place erected those houses. By little and little it grew to so great an height, as if all writers should be ignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time done at once, which seemed worth the memoriall. For, Historiographers are wont to deliver unto posteritie those things only which are rare and worthie of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium majus, and setting aside the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest beeing either replenished with vines or fit for pasture, yeeldeth grasse and food, for sheepe, caples, and goats. So as it seemeth it may be called Balanium of the bleating that sheepe make, rather than Palantium.

This Palatium had also a place therein called Atrium, built in old time and hallowed by Augurie: in it the Senat sate in counsell, because they might not assemble in any place unaugurate or unhallowed. Therein also rammes were sacrificed.

The old gate of the Palatium was neere the Roftra, over-against S. Lawrence church in Miranda. Some would have this to be called the gate of Romulus, in old time.

CHAP. VIII.

The temples of Janus, Augustus, and Faustina.

AFTER the description of the temples and edifices of Palatium the third part of the citie, now followeth a fourth; namely the Romane Forum. Therein is the most stately temple of Janus, (for me thinkes wee doe well to begin at Janus, who is counted the dore and entrance as it were of all things) having four gates. For Janus himselfe, who was therein worshipped, had foure faces; & from Faliscia a citie in Tuscane forced by the Romans, he was translated to Rome into the Forum, named after Transitorium. His temple was built in that part of the said Forum which looked toward the Romane Forum. Procopius saith, that in his daies it was built in the mids of the Forum over-against the Capitoll; a little above the place which the Romans called, The three Destinies. Other temples there were besides of Janus, and namely in the Capitoll neere the theatre of Marcellus, with two fronts all of brasie, and had two brazen dores, which in time of peace were shut; and against warre, were set open.

The temple of Augustus was builded in the Romane Forum. This was begun in the time of Tiberius the Emperour, but left unperfected. Caligula finished it. Above it, he made a bridge which joyned the Capitoll and Palatine together.

There remaine yet to be scene certaine monuments and markes of the temple of Faustina. Hadrianus the emperour her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill (where the brazen image of a bull standeth) for her sake, that she might be honoured as a goddesse. The same, his sonne Antoninus Heliogabalus afterwards would have to be a temple for himselfe, or Jupiter Syrius, or els the Sunne. At this day it is the Church of S. Lawrence in Miranda.

CHAP. IX.

The temple of Castor and Pollux, and the Roftra.

NO man doubteth but that the temple of Castor and Pollux was sometime in the Romane Forum before the Roftra, neere to that abovesaid of Faustina. This sacred house A. Poethunius the Dictator dedicated; and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dalmatian spoiles. In it, as in many other, the Senate used to sit in counsell, and therein were publicke orations made to the people. Cacilius Metellus adorned the same with statues, pillars, and excellent painting: wherein also hee set up the pourtraiture and resemblance of Flora, a picture of singular beautie. A table besides, which containe the records and monuments, touching the free burgeoisie graunted to the horsemen of Capua. The steps and greeces going up to this temple, Clodius afterwards plucked up, as witnesseth Cicero.

There was a temple or consecrate place called Roftra, at the foot of the hill Palatium, over-against that before-named of Castor and Pollux, whereas now is the little chappell of S. Marie de Inferno. From these Roftra, were the sentences and acts of the Senat, brought and propounded to the people.

CHAP. X.

The temple of Caesar, Venus Genetrix, and Mars revenger: and the courts of Venus.

CÆsar of famous memorie had a temple neere his own Forum, at the broad street called Sacra, behind the temple of Faustina. In it were set up as Saints, Victorie and Castor.

In the same Caesars Forum, there stood a chappell of Venus Genetrix, behind the said temple of Faustina. This, Caesar vowed in the Pharaliam war, and dedicated it. After victorie in the warre against Pompey, Caesar enclosed the temple of the said Venus, within a court-yard and a cloister, which Hadrian afterwards repaired and built new.

Augustus

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Augustus Caesar in the battaile of Philippi, vowed a temple to Mars the avenger, which afterwards hee edified in his owne Forum, wherein were certaine iron pots dedicated to Mars: and two statues, bearing up the tabernacle of Alexander the Great. This is thought to be at this day the church of saint Martina.

CHAP. XI.

The temples of Vulcan, Concord, Peace, Romulus, and Venus Cloacina.

THe temple of Vulcan, Romulus founded, above the Comitium and Forum Romanum, at the bottome of the Palatine hill: but Tatius dedicated the temple of Vulcan, as also of the Sunne and Moone, of Saturne, Rhea, Vesta, Diana, and Quirinus. In the temple of Vulcan there was dedicated unto Vulcan, the brazen chariot of Romulus, wherein he rode in triumph a second time. Therein remained also the statue of Cocles there erected. Many a time were orations made to the people in this temple.

In the yard belonging to Vulcan temple, Eulvius, the sonne of a Libertine or enfranchised citizen, 303 yeeres after the building of the Capitoll, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senators and gentlemen to the people. Afterwards hee built it of the amercements and penalties that hee tooke of Vsurers condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine. Optimus the Consul afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Plinie testifieth that an altar ran blood for two daies.

Livia Drusilla in her open gallerie, erected a chappell of Concord, in regard of the mutuall and loving agreement between her husband and her: which afterwards Tyberius dedicated.

In that place where Drusilla first founded the said chappell of Concord, Vespasian afterwards with wonderfull celeritie and speed, (after the civill warres ended) finished the temple of Peace, begun before by Claudian. A large building this was and foure square, set out with most stately and faire columnes, and of all other temples the richest. In it Vespasian bestowed the holy vessels and pretious ornaments of the temple in Hierusalem, which T. had shewed in triumph. It had also the statue of Ganymedes, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This temple caught a fire, and at once sodainly was consumed whole: and never was it knowne to this day how this fire came; unless it were (as some imagine) by reason of an earthquake which happened the same houre, the stones rubbed together and strucke fire.

An altar of Peace was by Augustus first reared; but in what place, the posteritie knoweth not. The same, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned. Betweene the temple of Peace and Faustina, there is at this day a most auncient temple, and two pillars of the porch to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Cosmes and Damians. Some thinke it was the temple of Romulus and Remus, the same that Corvilius the Consul, after hee had subdued the Samnites, dedicated, and of the infinite masse of spoiles adorned it.

That the temple of Venus Cloacina stood neer the broad street Sacra, Ovid testifieth. Now the image of this Cloacina was found in a privie or draught, called Maxima, and Tatius consecrated it. And because it was not knowne whole resemblance it was, it tooke the name of the place wherein it was found.

CHAP. XII.

The temples of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sunne and Moone, the house of Caisius, and the Armorie.

WHere the temple of Tellus stood, some say it is uncertein; others thinke it was not farre from the Esquiline, neere the rising of the hill that leadeth to S. Peters church in Vinculis, where as now standeth the temple of Pantalcon. Sempronius vowed it: for whiles he fought a battaile with his enemy, at Alculum the head towne of the Picentines, the earth quaked: and because he would pacifie the goddesse Tellus (i. the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this temple unto her. Built it was in the same plot of void ground, where the house of Spurius Caisius (who sought to be a king) was overthrowne. Neere unto this temple of Tellus, there was an Armorie; whereof Cicero also maketh mention in a certaine place. Within the said compasse, C. Iulius Iuliaculus the Consul, vowed a chappell to the goddesse Salus, in the time of the Samnites warre. The same was by him put forth to building when he was Censor, and dedicated by him Dictatour.

L. Volumnius an Aedile, caused the temple of Victoria neere the Romane Forum to be made, of the penalties and fines taken.

In this place also was the altar of Apollus.

Some would have, that the temples of Concord and Esculapius, were neere the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Maria the new.

The temple of Marte also was in the Forum.

The

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

The temples likewise of Isis and Serapis were in the Burse called Emporium. And some thinke, that these were the Chappels of the Sunne and Moone, dedicated by Tatius.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: the things now therein, or that have been heretofore.

THus much of temples, of holy and religious places, which seemed worth the noting, hath been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will speake of those things, which shall concerne the honour and memoriall of mortall men, and first begin we will with that excellent prince Trajanus.

Forum Traiani was built (with wonderfull Art and industrie of man) by Apollodorus, betweene the Forum of Nerva, the Capitoll hill, and the mount Quirinal. The same workeman built also (at the commaundement of Trajanus) Metodeum and Gymnasium. The rouse of that Forum or Hall was of brass, within round about in every place the formes and images of horses, and militarie ensignes all guile. Now were these foresaid images erected there at the cities charges in memoriall of them that had deserved well of the common weale, or otherwise of some notable act.

The triumphant arch in like manners with many other monuments reared to the praise of Trajanus, adorned this Forum or hall of his.

The porch of this Forum, built upon most mightie and high pillars, and resting upon large chappiters, yielded so great admiration to the beholders, that they seemed rather the workes of gyants than men. Into this, Alexander Severus in the honour of Trajanus, translated most beautiful statues of singular men.

Trajanus horse in like manner stood in the mids, bearing upon high columnes.

In a coine also there is found the image of Trajanus, with this inscription: S. P. Q. R. OPTIMO PRINCIPI, THE SENATE AND PEOPLE OF ROME TO THE BEST PRINCE. But hereof Lampidius writeth much.

He likewise is reported, to have adorned the palace, made of sundrie marbles, with pictures and statues within.

In the mids of the Forum, there stood the Columne of Trajanus, built with winding stairs. This had round about it the summarie of the acts of Trajanus engraven and chased most cunningly; but above all the Dakes warre: within-forth there bee 185 steps up to the top; and it hath 40 little windowes to let in light unto them that shall goe up: 120 foot high it was, or (as Eutropius writeth) 140. In the louver or lanterne thereof were the bones of Trajanus kept within a golden ball. This pillar, Trajanus himselfe never saw: for whiles he warred against the Parthians, the Senat dedicated it unto him in his absence. But hee in his returne from the Persians, died by the way, at Seleucia a citie in Syria, of a fluxe of blood. His dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperours, hee alone (as Eutropius writeth) was entered within the citie. The reason why his bones are left in that Columne is this: The manner in old time was, for princes and noble men to be buried under hills: but there being not mountaines enough wherupon to raise sepulchres in every place, it happened that such steeples and high pillars were set over their dead bodies in steed thereof.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum, the palace, and porch of Nerva.

NExt to our sight cometh the Forum of Nerva, & it is behind the Church of S. Hadian. In the mids of it there stood a Columne of brasle of an huge bignesse; covered with plate of latten or copper, and hath within it, light every way. This Forum was garnished with divers statues and columnes, containing the whole order of all the actes of Nerva. This was afterwards called Forum Transitorium, for that from it there was the way to the Forum of Augustus, and the Romane.

There appeareth as yet some part of the porch or gallerie belonging to that Forum: for being consumed by fire, yet it left certaine obscure tokens, witnessing, that in the same place was the Forum of Nerva.

Part also of the palace of Nerva, built of 4 square stones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blase, are yet seene enclosed betweene the Comitium and the tower of Milicia.

CHAP. XV.

The Romane Forum, the Comitium, the prison Tullianum, and the image of Marforius.

THe Romane Forum, which also is called Latinum, began at the foot of the Capitoll, and reached in length to the Church now of Saint Maria the new, which is in Velia. But at the first, the

Z z z z z iij

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

the circuit and bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof above named; it went no farther than the nearest foot of the mount Palatine. Many a yeere after, Augustus Cæsar enlarged it.

The Comitium joined to the Forum; or rather it was a part thereof: for it beginneth at the gate of Palatium, and endeth at the church of S. Martina the new.

At the foot of the Capitoll hill, South-eastward, Annius Marinus built a prison for malefactors to be laid up in. After him king Tullius adjoined to it that part which is under the ground, and called that dungeon, Tullianum. Made it was of huge & mighty big stones; with narrow long holes, for to receive the shadow as it were and resemblance of a light. The dungeon within was vaulted with stone, ugly for darkenesse, and foathsome by reason of a strong and stinking sent. This whole prison was divided into two parts, the upper rowine and the nether. Cæsar it was called in Latine a concendo, because it kept them there enclosed from coming forth.

Just before this prison there lieth a huge marble-idoll which they call Mæserius. Some think it was the image of the bakers god, others, of Super surnamed Panarius; of the tumours that beare out, like to loaves of bread. For the Romanes in times past, when they were besieged by the Gauls in the Capitoll, had warning by Super in a dreame, to make bread of all the corne that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies campe. Whereby the Gauls despairing that the Romanes could possibly be ramed with hunger, brake up the siege. Whereupon the Romanes in perpetuall memonall of this benefit, erected an altar and a statue to Super Pistor.

This image is thought to be the resemblance of the river Rhenus in Germanie; because it is upon a rocke. But why it should be called Mæserius, I know not, unless it be because it standeth in the Forum of Augustus.

CHAP. XVI.

The Secretarie of the people of Rome; the arch of Septimius; the temple of Saturne. Of the Treasure, and the mint-house where they coined monie.

BEhind the image of Mæserius, over against the arch of Septimius, is the church of S. Martina: where, as it appeareth by an evidence engraven in marble, was sometime the place called the Secretarie of the people of Rome.

Right against the said church of S. Martina at the bottome of the rocke Tarpeia, standeth the arch of Septimius, which in both the fronts thereof containeth the deeds of that emperor both by land and sea.

Directly there followeth the temple, sometime of Saturne, now, S. Hadrians church. The said temple was of great antiquitie. Some report L. Lægius for the builder thereof; others L. Tarquinius: albeit more likely it is that Lægius dedicated it. Livie writeth, that when A. Sempronius and M. Minutius were Consuls, Nimantius Plancus reedified it. The treasure of the people of Rome, no writer denieth, but that it was translated out of the Capitoll into this temple. But why men in old time would have the treasure to be within Saturns temple, there be divers opinions. Some say, because in Saturnes daies there was no theft committed: for under him all things were common; no covetous miser, nor leawd person laid wait for his neighbour, but all things were admittred with righteousness, faith, and love. Cyprian alleageth this cause, because Saturn was the first that in Italie ordained mony to be coined. Moreover, in this treasure-house were kept the publicke ordinances. Also the bookes called Elephantini, containing the five and thirtie tribes of the people of Rome. Moreover, all the books of the cities accounts: also the ancient writings and records of the old Ærarium & of the citie debts. Furthermore, the standards and ensignes of war. Over and besides, whatsoever was by the Generals and captains after the conquest of provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Lastly, whatsoever was expedient and profitable for the Commonweale to be reserved, as lawes, letters, and other common registers of a citie. The Censors likewise were put to take their oth in the temple of Saturne.

Betweene the church now of S. Hadrian, and that which sometime was the temple of Cæsar & Pollux, stood in old time the worke-house wherein they coined money.

CHAP. XVII.

The golden Miliarium, the bridge of Caligula, the Rostra and the Curia.

Miliarium aureum stood in times past at the head of the Romane Forum, under the temple of Saturne, neere to the arch of Septimius. A pillar it was, so called, wherein all the high waies of Italie were cut and engraven, and there ended, and from which the measures began and went on to every gate of all quarters.

Caligula brought a bridge of marble through the Romane Forum, from the mount Palatine to the Capitoll.

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Capitoll. A more stately and curious peece of work there never was throughout all the citie: for the bridge was sustained with fourscore mightie pillars of most white marble; whereof at this day three are to be seene at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other; in such manner as they were in times past by Caligula built for the bridge. In the mids of the Forum, over-against S. Hadrians church there standeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that supported the brazen horie of Domitian gilded all over. At the foot of this horie was the resemblance of Rhene, a river in Germanie; for that Domitian the emperor had triumphed over that province. And this is the image which afterwards they called Marforius.

Of the beakeheads of the Antiate ships, a pulpit was built in the Romane Forum by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which temple they called Rostra, that therein the acts of the Senate should be made. Now of this Rostra there were twaine; the new at the bottome of the Palatine as is before said, and the old, neere the Curia in the Comitium. In this Rostra were lawes published, causes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the same the manner was also to erect the Statues for most famous and noble men.

In the most conspicuous place of the Forum Romanum, before Rostra, upon a lion of stone was the portraiture of Faustulus the fosterfather of Romulus & Remus. For he, while he was desirous to part the fray betweene Romulus and Remus the founders of the citie, was there slaine, where, afterwards they erected unto him his statue. Behind the Rostra was the sepulchre also of Romulus. Moreover, before the Rostra stood the statue of Hercules, clad in a coat after the Eleans habite, with a grim and sterne countenance. Three statues also of Sibylla in the same place. The manner of the Romanes besides, was to set up the heads of those that were put to death, there to be seene.

Two Curie or Counsell-houses at Rome there were: one neere the Forum, fast by the temple of Peace named Hofilia; the other in the mount Cælius, whereof we will speake hereafter.

CHAP. XVIII.

The lake Curtius, the great sinke or town ditch, and the Doliola.

The lake Curtius was in the midst of the Rom. Forum, neere Domitian his horie. This lake tooke that name of M. Curtius, who to save the Commonweale, willingly of his own accord cast himselfe headlong, armed as hee was, together with his horie into a chinke of the ground in the middelt of the Romane Forum. Some would have it so called of Metius Curtius a Sabine, who through this lake escaped safe to his owne companie.

The vault or sinke called Cloaca Maxima, was made by the commaundement of Tarquine: for by reason that the hills were digged under, and the citie stood hollow upon arches, it received and carried away all the filth thereof. At the temple of Iup. Stator, devided it was into three conveighances or channels, whereof two of them are now stopp'd up, the third runneth with most cleere water by the lake Curtius, under the Roman Forum, along the foot of the mount Palatine into Velabrum, and from thence in a sinke made of four square stone, it dischargeth it selfe into Tyber. In old time there were many such vaults, & those for publicke use. But after the citie was woon by the Gauls & burnt, whiles every man made hast to rebuild his house, where hee could meet first with a convenient place; they tooke no heed to the streets as they were before: so as neither the citie was devided as aforetime into quarters, nor yet the sinkes which in times past went under the streets, were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveighed under private mens houses, whereby it came to passe, that each house almost at this day hath a sinke or privie belonging to it. Hereupon also it is, that this authour, whose epitome or abridgement we write, hath not divided the regions of the citie, agreeable to the old writers. But to the end that those things which he setteth down, might be sooner understood, and better remembred, he hath parted it into those quarters as now it standeth: and when hee sheweth in what part of the citie any place in times past was, he declareth them in those coasts which at this day are known to the inhabitants. But as at first these sinkes were common (as I have said) so there were appointed publicke overseers to looke unto them.

Neere the foresaid great sinke there was a place, which of certaine barrels under the ground was called Doliola. This place was reputed so holy, that a man might not spit thereupon. In it were supposed to have been, certaine secret mysteries of Numa. And yet, there be that thinke verily the ashes of the French Senones were there bestowed.

CHAP. XIX.

The Comitium, the temple of Venus Genetrix. The statues and images that were in the Comitium and Romane Forum. Cæsars statue and pillar.

VHere the Comitium was, from what place it began, & in what part of the citie it ended, we have shewed before, in the 15 chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium, as Plus arch faith for for that Romulus and Tatius were wont to meet together in this place, to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senate and people of Rome assembled, when they would decree any thing for the good of the C. VV. and namely, when Consuls, Tribunes Consular, and such magistrates were created, and other affaires concluded; whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was neere the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Palatine. This Comitium was open above-head for many yeeres: whereupon oftentimes, albeit assemblies were summoned, yet they were enpeached: holding for them, fearing some tempestuous weather toward. Long time after, when Anniball came into Italie, they set a rouse over it: and afterwards Cæsar repaired it againe. In this Comitium the plaies were many times exhibited. In the same (as Livius reporteth) the bookes of Sibylla were burnt. In like manner many leaud and outrageous acts were committed in the assemblies there, whereof elsewhere we will speake.

In the Comitium stood the statue of Cæsar, which being afterwards stricken with fire from heaven, was translated into the court-yard of Vulcani. In the cantons & angles of the Comitium, were the statues like unto of Pythagoras and Alcibiades: Also in the ascent and stairs thereof, on the left hand of the Curia, stood the image of Actius, together with his whetstone and rasour.

The image resembling the Mother goddess, was set up in the Forum. They that worshipped this goddess were of this opinion, that the stone whereof shee was made, could not possibly be consumed with fire; which they guessed hereby, for that albeit many fires were made, in the night especially at her image, yet it took no hurt thereby; and therefore gave they out, that there was such vertue herein, as I have said. And from hence it came, that in all streets almost they began to worship her, and to erect altars and little chappels unto her.

The temple of Venus Genetrix, as is shewed before, was in the Forum. Just before this temple stood the statue of Cæsar, carrying a blazing star upon the head. In like manner a Colonne of Cæsar made of Numidian marble 20 foot high, there remained. Before the temple of Castor, there was the statue of Q. Marius in horsmans habit; of Tremellius clad in a side gowne; of M. Atticus covered with a vaile.

CHAP. XX.

The colunne called Mœnia: the pillar Horatia: the houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian. The temple and court-yard of the said Cæsar.

IN that part of the Forum was the colunne Mœnia, where stood the pallace of Portius. Called Mœnia it was, of Manius the Censor: for hee (when as he sold unto Cato his house, and when Flaccus the other Censor gave order, that the palace aforesaid should there be built) reserved in the sale so much space for himselfe, as a pillar or colunne would take up: upon the which he might put out a loft to jutte forth, made of joists and boards upon them: from which place both he and his posteritie might behold the sport of sword-fencers. And this priviledge hee obtained: whereupon, others also, as many as might bee allowed, were as industrious, and built them colunnes in the Forum.

There stood a rock of stone also in the Forum, whereupon the spoiles of the three twinnes Crutius were hanged.

In like manner, the pillar called Horatia.

The houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian beautified the Forum.

Likewise the court and cloister of Minerva; and the shops [of Bankers] as well old as new.

The dead corps of Cæsar was brought out of the Curia into the Forum, and entered in that place, where afterwards they built unto him an altar and temple.

Likewise in the Forum the manner of the Romanes was, to lay downe their magistracie.

CHAP. XXI.

Cæsars Forum: the palace of Paulus, and his Librarie.

BESIDES the temple of Saturne, or the common treasure (whereof we have written before in the 16 chapter of this booke) in the Romane Forum toward the Northeast, was Cæsars Forum, even in that very place which seemeth lower than the rest, behind the temple of Faustina. There, was the temple of Venus Genetrix, about which, Cæsar made a cloister and a Forum, not of wares and marchandise to be sold, but for them that repaired thither for justice in law matters. In this Forum, among other statues (whereof there were many and those most faire and beautifull) he suffered his owne to be made, all armed. The Forum it selfe contained but a small compasse, but it was most excellently set out. The very level of the plot stood him in an hundred millions of Ailes and above.

Cæsar purchased with 1500 talents, Paulus Emilius the colleague of C. Marcellus in his Consulship, to be his friend and to stand with him. Paulus having received this summe of mony, built in the middle of of the Forum neere to the temple of Castor and Pollux, a most excellent and wonderfull pallace, of Phrygian colunnes, which afterwards they named, Basilici Pauli.

A Librarie also the same Paulus erected, neere unto his owne Basilici.

CHAP. XXII.

The Forum of Augustus: the galleries of Antonius, Faustina, and Livia: Cæsars house.

THE Romane Forum, those also of [Julius] Cæsar and Augustus, were (as it is well knowne) neere one to another. That of Augustus, they affirme to have been at the image of Marforius, in the most frequented place of the citie: it was but little in compasse, as the other of Cæsars, but excellently well adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Castor and Pollux, with the victorie of Alexander the Great: the image also of Corrinus, and of the raven that upon his helmet fought. Also Apollo in yvorie: and besides these, other ensignes and ornaments of vertue and valour.

In this Hall or Forum, publicke justice was administred: and the judges from thence were empannelled: herein they debated in counsell, of wars, of triumphes, and other weightie affaires. From hence they used to goe when they tooke journey into their provinces with soveraigne command. Hither, they that returned victors, brought the ensignes and tokens of their victorie. This Forum being by time decayed, Hadrian reedified.

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out and decked in triumphant manner. Augustus dwelt in the street Sacra, in a house not so large and stately, but marvellously furnished by his neece Livia. And Augustus not able to abide this wastfull superfluitie of riches, pulled it downe and laid it even with the ground: in the void plot and court-yard whereof, was afterwards built the gallerie of Livia; which also was called Claudia. Nero cast it downe, but Domitian built it up againe under the old name.

The goodlie galleries of Antonine and Faustina, adorned with divers and sundry marbles well built in old time, were whereas at this day standeth the church of S. Lawrence in Miranda.

CHAP. XXIII.

The raster or beame called Sororium Tigillum: the street Syprius, Sceleratus, and Patritius: the house of M. Antonius.

SORORIUM Tigillum was a place hallowed for the expiation and assailing of Horatius for killing his sister, set up neere the street Carinae, to the honour of Jupiter.

The street Cyprinus is neere to the cliffe or rising of the Capitoll, which leadeth to the church of S. Peter in Vinculis, so called of Cyprus. In it dwelt the Sabines first, when they were afranchised and made free-demons. Surnamed afterwards it was Sceleratus, upon the wicked and devilish act of Tullia, whereof Livius speaketh. Some thinke this was all one with the former: others say it was divers from it.

The street Patritius, was so called, because of the Patritij, who were by K. Tullus commaunded there to dwell. For this was a place raised somewhat higher than others; from whence as from the upper ground, they might easily defend themselves against the sodaine violence of others, if it should be offered.

M. Antonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the temple of Tellus. After Antonie, the church of S. Pantalion was in the same place built.

CHAP. XXIII.

Busta Gallica, and Aequimelum.

BUSTA Gallica, was a place in the heart of the citie, where the dead bodies of the Frenchmen that held Rome, were burnt and buried. It was in that part of the citie where at this day standeth the Church of S. Andrew (in Busta Gallica.) Now they call it by an awke name, Portugallo: and it is not far from the Amphitheatre. Varro setteth the Busta Gallica neere the Aequimelum. As for Aequimelum, it was so called, because the house of Melius who fought to be K. was there laid levell with the ground.

CHAP. XXV.

The street called Via Sacra: the arch Fabian and Vespasian.

THIS street beginneth at the old Curia, in the angle of Palatium neere the arch of [Great] Constantine. Varro supposeth that it began at the Carinae and the chappell of Sternie. VVhereby a man man may gather, that the Via Sacra sometimes went through the gardens now of S. Marie the new, to the temple of Peace, the Forum of Cæsar, and so directly up to the castle of the Capitoll. The name of Sacra it tooke, for that the Augurs when they came from the Capitoll hill, went through it as they tooke their Augurie: or because monthly, they went in procession with sacred reliques along that way: or last of all, in regard that in it there was a league and covenant made betwene Romulus and Tatius. At the head and top of it, Ancus Martius in times past dwelt, neere the chappell of the Lares.

In this street was the famous statue set up of Clodia.

The arch Fabian likewise, neere the kings palace, fast by the Basilica of Paulus, was reared by Fabius the Censor, who subdued the Allobroges. In which arch was the scutcheon with his armes, and other tokens of the victorie engraven. Fast by it, Scribonius Libo erected a seat and Tribunal for the Pretour, named Puteal.

In the same street-way, was the marble arch of Vespasian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be seene) erected by Vespasian after hee had won Hierusalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with the arke of the covenant of one side; and on the other, his triumphs and spoiles; and namely, the golden candlestick; the seven other lights, the two tables of Moses, the vessels of the temple of Hierusalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things else, whereof Iosephus writeth.

CHAP. XXVI.

Græcostasis; Senaculum; the Curia; the pallaces of Opimius and Porcius.

 Ræcostasis is a place on the right hand of the Rostra, as men goe forth of the Comitium; where, the embassadours of forreign nations beeing sent unto the Senat, used to stand and give attendance, untill they were admitted to audience.

The pallace of Opimius, and the Curia, stood neere unto the Græcostasis. Above the Græcostasis was the Senaculum at the temple of Concord. Called it was Senaculum, because the Senat or the elders, were wont there to meet. In Greeke it is named ἑκαστα.

Curia was in the Comitium, and some thinke it is all one with Senaculum: so called, because the affaires that required publicke care, were there debated. There was a Curia also of priests, where church matters were handled and treated of. Now this Curia where the Senat met, was a temple or halloved place: for neither might the Senat meet, nor act of Senat passe, but in place set out and appointed by augurie. Hercupon Curia Hostilia, Pompeia, and Iulia, being profane places before, were by inauguration consecrated temples. In this Curia was the altar of Victorie: & upon the staires of the said Curia stood the image of Victorie, made of fine and pure gold.

Cato the elder in the time of his Censorship, built (with the citie mony) a pallace neere to the Forum, under the Curia, which after his owne name he called Portia Basilica.

The pallace also of Romulus (as men thinke) stood where the church is now of S. Marie the new. These places therefore which have been thus described in the fourth region of the citie, joyned together in one place in a manner, and were all contained within this circuit, as you goe from the Comitium toward the temple of Peace, and the church and gardens of S. Marie the new almost as far as the Esquiliae.

THE FOURTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

The temple of Janus and Pietie: of the publicke goale of Rom. Commons.

 Eeing that foure parts of the citie are described, the fifth ensueth; which includeth those places that comprehend Tybre, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tarpeia on the left: the valley also which lyeth between those very hills. VVherefore begin wee will at the memorable places, which are next after the theatre of Marcellus, and so runne through the plaine and levell plot of the citie. And with Ianus first, whome men in old time beleaved to bee the verie dore and as it were the entraunce of all things. Vnto Ianus, Numa built a temple at the gate Carmentalis, (afterwards the chappell of Saint Katharine) at the botome of Argiletus, close unto the theatre of Marcellus. This temple had two dores: In time of peace they were shut, but but in warre opened by that Consull, who, as the worthier person was created first. It is found in records, that this temple was shut but onely thrice. First, by Numa himselfe: secondly, by T. Manlius the Consull: and a third time by Augustus, after the battell of Actium. But why in time of warre it stood open, many reasons are given: and this is thought the chiefe, namely, an accident that befell when Romulus warred against the Sabines: for when the Sabines were now possessed of the gate Carmentalis, and about to rush violently into the citie, all on a suddaine unlooked for, there issued forth upon the enemies a plenteous river and streame of hot scalding water out of the temple of Ianus, which stood neere to the gate: whereupon they were driven to flee, and so the citie was saved. From hence it is, that posteritie comming after, open the dores for Ianus that he might be at libertie, when he is called forth as it were, to helpe in time of warre.

Others report, that Tatius and Romulus both, were the founders of that temple: as who, when the covenant was made betwixt them, agreed together of that two-faced god, as an indifferent and common witness to them both of the accord contracted betwene two kings and two nations; and so erected unto him this temple in that very place where now the ruines of S. Katharines church are to be seene.

Moreover there be who affirme, that Cn. Duilius vowed it, and Tiberius built it: but the varietie of these opinions seemeth hereupon to arise; for that it is received and held for certain, that there were many Iani worshipped as gods by the posteritie; whereas they in old time beleaved but one: so as that which is spoken of divers, is fallily supposed, as said of one. VVhich may be seene before, where as wee wrote of Ianus with foure fronts or faces, whose temple was erected in the Forum. For it is said, that Ianus was the first who erected temples and ordained divine service and ceremonies for the gods; and therefore in sacrifices deserved the first place.

Pourtraied he is with a key and a wand; as who is the porter to keepe the gates, and the guide to direct the waies.

Augustus besides, brought his image out of Egypt to Rome, and in the hearb-market built a temple in the honour of him.

To Pietie in the said hearb-market, M. Atilius Glabrio dedicated a temple in that verie place where at this day standeth the Church of S. Nicholas in the prison: for even these Ap. Claudius the Decemvir by a decree of the Senat, built a prison, for that the common goale (whereof wee have written before) was not sufficient; and called it. The prison for the Commons of Rome: wherein himselfe afterwards being found guiltie, wrought his owne death. In which also many yeeres after, a certaine sillie poore woman of base and obscure parentage (being newly brought a bed) being apprehended for an heinous offence, was condemned to be starved to death. Her daughter, being a milch woman, and delivered lately of a child, made humble request to the goaler, that shee might have leave to goe to her mother: and when hee had made streight search before, whether shee brought with her any food; and saw her have nothing about her, let her in: and so she went and came, many times. At the last, knowne it was that the prisoner within was nourished by the breast-milke of her daughter: whereupon the mother was delivered and set free; and both mother and daughter were allowed their food ever after by vertue of a decree, at the cities charges: and in regard of that kindest and affection of the child to the mother, they consecrated this place to the goddesse Pietas. Livia supposed, that it was not the mother but the father, that in this manner was by the daughter nourished.

CHAP. II.

The hearb-market: the temple of Iuno Matuta, and of Hope: the oratorie or chappell of Numa: the colomme called Lactaria: the altar and chappell of Carmenta.

THis place hath the name of Forum Holitorium, for that therein is great store of woorts and pot-herbs, without the gate Carmentalis, where, in times past was the old market kept: and at this day called it is, the street Montanaria.

VVithin the compasse of the said market place, C. Cornelius the Consull, in the time of the Gaules warre, vowed a temple to Iuno Matuta: which afterward being Censor, hee put out to building, in that very place where afterwards stood the church of S. Andrew surnamed in Mentuza.

The same C. Cornelius built in the Forum Holitorium, the temple of Hope, and the same adorned with divers and sundrie marbles: which afterwards Collatinus consecrated. Many a day after, it was smitten with lightning; and in the end set on fire and burnt.

A colomme also there was in the same market place named Lactaria: unto which the sucking babes that were to be nourished with milke, were presented.

The oratorie of Numa, stood in the bottome of Argiletum, neere the theatre of Marcellus.

The

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

The altar Carmentalis, consecrated by Evander to his mother Carmenta, stood before the gate Carmentalis.

In the same place also was the chappell of Carmenta built by the matrons of Rome. At the first, shee was called Nicostrata: but for that shee delivered Oracles in verse, shee tooke the name of Carmenta.

CHAP. III.

The fish market, and temple of Fortuna Virilis.

THe fish market standeth along the Tybre, neere to the [Forum] Iunium, betweene the Churches of Saint Maria in Porticu and Egyptiaca, within the gate Carmentalis, not farre from the Forum Boarium, i. the oxen market.

The Church of S. Maria Egyptiaca is at this day neere the Tybre, and a bridge of the said name. Some goe about to affirme and proove, that this was sometime the temple of Mercie; others, of Fortune and Chastitie; but all in vaine: for those temples were not in this place, but in the oxen market: as for this temple of Fortuna Virilis, whereof we now speak, it was neer Tybre. In it stood the statue of Serv. Tullius made of wood and guilt all over, which in a great skare-fire when all things else were burnt, remained only safe and sound.

CHAP. IIII.

The temple of Vesta, the Salinae, and the arch of Caelus.

Here the church of Maria surnamed Egyptiaca, there remaineth at this day a most auncient temple, now dedicated to S. Stephen, the frame whereof is circular, and the pillars are set round about and beare up the rouse; which being one entire peece of worke, carrieth the whole temple. Consecrated it was in old time to Vesta: and Numa taking that circular platforme, from the temple which was at Alba, made it with a louver in the top, having a hole to give light.

Howbeit of this goddesse her selfe there is no image nor resemblance; for that fire, whereof shee is the goddesse, can have no certeine and permanent forme. As for Vesta, the Latines call her so, because shee is arrayed with divers and sundrie things. Of the Greekes shee is named Vesta, for that her force and power appertaineth to altars and hearthes where fire is kept. This is not the temple where in the sacred fire is preserved: but that whereof wee spake before, which Romulus built betweene the Capitoll and Palatium.

Salinae, were the store-houses of the salt which served the citie; and they stood upon that bankeside of Tybre, which from the foresaid temple of Vesta reacheth into the Aventine.

The arch of Horatius Caelus stood at the very foot of the Aventine hill, where the rising thereof beginneth, betweene the mount and the Tybre.

CHAP. V.

The Forum Boarium.

Hitherto from the beginning of this fourth book, are described those things which on the right hand of Tybre were worth the noting. Now forward we will after our manner, run through all the memorable things which are on the left side of that river: and first as concerning the beast-market.

The beast-market was neere to Velabrum and Ianus, betweene the mount Palatine and the Greeke schoole, close to the temple, now called S. Gregories church. In it there was a most auncient image in brasse of a bull, whereupon some thinke it tooke the name Boarium. Others, for that oxen were there sold: or because they used in old time to sacrifice those kind of beasts there: or else, for that Evander in that place killed an oxen in sacrifice to Hercules, for killing Cacus and recovering again his kine and oxen. In the same place were kept the instruments wherewith the ministers belonging to sacrifices, the sacrificers also themselves, were furnished when they went about their sacrifice. In this market-place was the first fight exhibited of sword-fencers.

CHAP. VI.

The temple of Hercules Victor, and the altar called Maxima.

THe round temple of Iupiter Victor was built in the beast-market, neere the Greeke schoole: where sometime Evander reared unto Hercules the altar called Maxima. This temple (as they say)

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

(say) was so religious and venerable, that neither flie nor dog would enter into it. For Hercules at what time as hee distributed a dole of flesh to his followers and ministers in his sacrifice, praised unto Myiagirus [the god that gathereth flies.] He it is therefore that driveth away all flies from this temple: and at the dore thereof he left his club behind, which so soone as the dogs see, they run away far off: and thus unto the daies wherein Plinie lived, it was free from flies and dogs. At the sacrifice and divine service of this Hercules, neither women nor bondslaves, ne yet freed men that had beene in villenage, might bee present. At the last, this temple was consumed in that fire which Nero the emperor made.

Over and besides, Evander erected unto Hercules a statue, which was called Hercules Triumphant, because so often as there was any triumph in the cittie, it was clad with the mantle, and other habiliments of triumph.

All the time that Evander reigned, Hercules had no more but an altar which they called Maxima: and this Evander reared unto him for killing of Cacus, and restoring his kine and oxen again. Upon this altar hee sacrificed the tenth part of the fruit of his kine: for Hercules had given out and promised, That they should live an happy life, who dedicated unto him the tenth part of their goods. Hereupon commeth the name of Decime Herculaneæ: i. Hercules Tithes.

CHAP. VII.

The temples of Chastitie, Prosperous Fortune, Matuta, and Fors fortuna: of the place called Vicus Publicus, Velabrum: and the sepulchre also of Acca Laurentia.

NEere to the temple of Hercules, well known it is that a chappell was built by Aemilius to Pudicitia Patricia, i. Gentlewomens chastitie. Now the image that represented this Saint, stood in the beast-market. To the service and sacrifices celebrated unto this goddesse, virgines that were Commoners daughters might not come. And therefore a certain maiden of Commoners degree, reared a chappell also to Pudicitia Plebeia. From the service and sacrifices thereof, the Patritian virgins were likewise debarred. Many other places & temples besides, were consecrated to Pudicitia.

The temples of Prosperous Fortune and of Matuta, Servius Tullius consecrated in the beasts market: And that Fortune hee called Proserpa, which was not blind. In that place (they say) an Olive tree sometimes stood, and upon a time when honey dropped & flowed from it, the Soothsayers gave order, that a little cofer or box should be made of the wood thereof; wherein those lots were put and laid up, which by the direction of Fortune were either handled or shuffled together by the hands of yong boies: as if such should prove happie, fortunate, and excellent. Servius Tullius ascribed all his acts whatsoever to Fortune, who being borne of a bondwoman, had many times found good by her, and was in the end advanced to princely dignitie. And hereupon hee dedicated temples to Fortuna Primigenia, Mafcola, Conversens, Bene sperans, and Videns, as who would say, she ruled and did all. Likewise, a temple he consecrated to little Fortune, signifying thereby, that nothing can happen unto us, bee it never so small, but we must attribute it, as comming from the gods.

A temple to Matuta, Camillus vowed in the Veientian warre and dedicated it; which long before that time Servius Tullius had erected. To Matuta and Fortuna Primigenia the Romanes did sacrifice upon one and the selfe same day: and likewise in one and the same day both their chappels were burned and consumed with fire together. Cornelius the Consul caused a temple to bee made unto Fors Fortuna, or [Fortis Fortuna] neere unto that of Matuta, of the money raised out of the spoile gotten from the Tuscans.

The street called Vicus Publicus, began at the Forum Boarium, and went from thence unto the Aventine, as farre as to the temple of Iuno. In this street neere the said Forum was the chappell of Velabrum, in that very place where now standeth the church of Saint Gregorie in Velabrum, so called.

Aventine hill was sometime seperated from the other mountaines by the Tyber betweene: for before that Tarquinius Priscus turned the channell of Tyber, it brake out many times, and having found a frith or creeke, it beat upon the foot of the Aventine. And therefore of necessity, whosoever would goe to the Aventine, was to make a fare, that is to say, by paying his quadrant, ferric over thether in a whirrey. Hereupon that place is at this day called Velabrum, a vehendo, i. ferrying over, where sometimes the Tyber had wrought out a frith.

Antias hath left in writing, that the sepulchre of Acca Laurentia was in Velabrum.

CHAP. VIII.

Vertumnus and his temple; Ianus with foure faces; the house of Africanus; the court or pallace Sempronia, and the wooll shops.

MEn in old time called Vertumnus, not only the god of buying, selling, and offruits; but also him that ruled mens minds, so named a Vertendo, for that oftentimes he turned and chaunged at his will & pleasure the purposes & thoughts of men another way far diuers. His temple & image they erected in the Tuscan street, neere to the altars of Ops and Ceres. The festiual daies of this god, celebrated in the month October, are called Vertumnalia. Some there bee that would haue Vertumnus and Ianus with foure faces to be all one; upon this reason, for that they affirme the temple of Ianus afore said to bee in Velabrum, whereas they built that of Vertumnus. But now that temple, whereof we haue before spoken, upon foure pillars beareth up one rouse, and hath foure gates besides, and in each forefront twelve little windowes, which signifie the foure quarters of the yeere and the twelve months. In old time they put Ianus before, in all sacrifices, and gave him that name ab eundo, i. going, and hereupon the entries and dores of houses be called Ianua.

Neere the image of Vertumnus, Pub. Africanus had an house, which Sempronius afterwards bought together with the wooll shops, and built the pallace which they call Sempronia, neere the temple of S. Gregore in Velabrum.

CHAP. IX.

Argiletus: the house of Cornelius; Aequimelum: the chappell of Surquedrie or slouth.

THe Argiletus beginneth at the bottome of the Tuscan street, and endeth at the Theatre of Marcellus. But Fabius Pistor saith, it began at the head of the said Tuscan street, under Corholus, betwene it and the great Lutes, and so reacheth to the Aventine. The name it taketh of a kind of clay or loime, whereof there is plentie in that place: or els of one Argus, who being entertained as a guest by Evander, laid a-wait for his life, intending after hee had murdered him, to be king and reigne himselfe. But the friends and companie about Evander discovered his traines, and so hee was by them slaine. Vnto him therefore Evander reared a tombe even there, and consecrated the place.

Now Ianus Argiletus is iust by the Theatre of Marcellus. In this street were diuers shops of artificers or artificers, & especially of stationers or booksellers, & those they comonly called the Argiletane shops.

Cornelius Domitianus is said to haue dwelt in Velabrum.

Aequimelum is betwene Velabrum and the Capitoll, neere to the staplers wooll shops. The name arose hereupon, for that Sp. Melius a Romane citizen who aspired to bee king, sometime there dwelt: who being detected of that crime, was killed, his goods confiscated, and his house laid leuell with the ground, and the plot where it stood, by the Romanes was made a void yard.

The temple of Murtia, goddess of Idleness, was under the Aventine, upon the ascent of the hill called Clivus Publicus, in that part whereas folke goe up to the church of Saint Prisca. Hereupon the mount Aventine was sometime called Murtius.

Moreover, some there be that in this place would haue the Asylum to stand: but wee haue shewed before that the Asylum was first built by Romulus upon the Capitoll. But in processe of time, after that so great riches and wealth was gathered and laid up there in the Capitoll, and that otherwhiles the Senat used there to meet and sit in counsell; the Romanes thought it not with the safest for them that theeves, fellons, and other leaud infamous persons of all sorts, should come for refuge thither, and there abide: and therefore they supposed it better for their securitie to translate this privileged sanctuary to some other place. VVhereupon not there alone, but in many other parts afterward there began sanctuaries to be set up, not at Rome only, but also in other quarters of the world.

CHAP. X.

Circus what it is, why it was so called, and for what cause ordained.

THe place where games and exercises of disport were performed, was called the Cirque: so named for that scaffolds were built in circuit round about to behold the pastimes; and within that compass the said solemnities were exhibited: also for that the pompe was carried in shew, and the horses ran about the goles there. Built it was round, but longwise like an arch or bow, having in the circuit about it steps one above another, with apt seats for the beholders; that one should not hinder the prospect of another: in the mids were two marks or goles distant alike one from the other. Also the barriers or carreres, so called, because the horses stood there pent and kept in untill the magistrat gave the signall to begin the course.

Now

Now these solemnities of games and plaies, are festivals in the honour of their gods: for ordained they were first and still are observed and kept, either for their birth-daies and natiuities, or dedications of temples. And at the first verily were hunting and baiting of beasts, which they called (Munera) to the honor of Saturne. But the stage plaies were due to Liber: the Circenian games to Neptune and Ceres. Thus these pastimes were assigned, some to these gods, and others to those; and in honour and memoriall of them yeerely solemnized. As for the games Circenies, they were so called, because when they were performed, they had the banke of the river of one side, and sword set to slanke the other. But of these games, plaies, and solemne fights, Sisinnus hath written at large.

CHAP. XI.

The great shew-place called Circus Maximus.

T*arquinius Priscus* instituted first this large circuit for running of races, and laid the foundation thereof betwene the two mounts Aventine and Palatine. But Caesar was hee that enlarged it, and made it more magnificent and stately. For being (as it was) three furlongs and an halfe in length, and foure acres broad; it is thought that it was Caesar and not Tarquinius, who set it out to that largenesse: and this foundeth like to a truth, considering that in Tarquinius daies the citie was not so populous, neither given so much to these shewes and fights, as in the time of Caesar, and therefore the place required not so great a compasse of ground. Now this Cirque for three parts thereof, to wit, the two sides and one of the ends, had a ditch digged ten foot deepe, and as many broad: behind that ditch were galleries built, three stories high; & these had seats made beneath with stone, and above of timber: at which galleries had one and the same bases, for they closed together round like a globe. Able they were to receive a hundred and fiftie thousand men. See more hereof in Dionysius, Plinie, Livy, and others who haue written of the Roman edifices. This Cirque, Augustus adorned and beautified afterwards: for hee made the barriers of marble, and gilded the goales, and many other ornaments hee set it out withall. Lastly, when it was decayed and fallen down, Frajanus reedified it, made it more ample, and trimmed it up. Yea, and after him, Helogabalus set thereto besides most faire and goodly Columns, and garnished them with gold, and paved the very floore with Chrysocolia. But as touching the beautie of this Cirque, Naxos writeth much. For, by report, so elegant it was, that men resorted to it, not so much to behold the exercises and mailtries there, as the pleasant and delectable beautie of the place. Maximus therefore it was called, either by cause consecrated it was to Fortunus, the greatest of the gods, or for the excellencie and sumptuousnesse of the games: or else because in comparast of other Circes, to wit, Flaminius, and the other called Intimus, the inmost, this was the biggest. For Plinie hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs, and one in breadth, so as it would well serve for two hundred and fixtie thousand men to sit within it.

CHAP. XII.

The temples and altars which weread to have been in the Circus Maximus, or about it.

C*erfus* is reported to bee the god of Counsell, either for that hee concealeth mens counsels, or openeth them unto men. This god had an altar in the great shew-place covered over: which betokeneth, that counsell ought to be close and covert. For which cause, this altar as we read, was by the old Romanes to him consecrated. For they, at what time as they consulted about the ravishing of the Sabine maidens, fearing least they should have been detected before the time, dedicated this altar to this god, and erected the portraiture and image of him thereon. VVhich altar verily, either by some iniurie of the times, or through mens neglect of the gods, continued so forlet, as in the end it was altogether unknowne where it stood. At length found it was againe, and at all other times remained covered, but in the time of horse-runnings, and then it was uncovered and set open. To this god was the feast also instituted, called Consualia. And those disports and pastimes which they devised for the ravishment of the Sabine virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certaine priests belonging to that god.

In like maner Neptune, surnamed the Chevalier, had a temple in this Circus Max. which in the yeer of our Lord 1526 was found behind the temple of S. Anastasia, at the foot of the mount Palatine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for such markes and tokens were there to be seene, that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptune, the games Circenies were by men in old time solemnized.

Also to Genius the guide & director of secret plots, they erected an altar in the great Cirque. Over and besides these, this Cirque contained three other altars: one to the Great gods; a second to the Penates; and a third to those gods of heaven & earth, from whom all things arise and have their beginning. These gods afore said, the Romanes called Genij, Penates, Presidents, and keepers of the citie.

Liber

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Libor, Libera, Ceres, and Proserpina, had their temples about this place called Circus Max. which Porcius when hee warred against the Latines, vowed: and the same man upon his returne with happie victorie, built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the same compasse were the temples of the Sunne, and of Flora.

Moreover, a temple there stood neere this Circus, unto Venus: which Q. Fabius Genger the Consull, caused to be made of the monie raised upon the fines of certaine wives that were condemned for playing false with their husbands.

Lucius dedicated a temple to Juvencus without the great cirque, not farre from that place.

In like sort, Mercurie had a temple neere this Circus Max.

In Plinius daies there was seene in the Cirque Max. the image of Fortuna Scia.

CHAP. XVII.

The Naumachie of the great Cirque.

Naumachie is a place so called in grecish naus maichion, i. for that in it they used to skirmish with ships. For there were places digged deepe like ponds, where were represented some shewes of navall fight, for the exercise of the Romane youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at sea also. And these kind of sports were exhibited and practised not in the Cirques onely, but also in the Amphitheatres.

CHAP. XVIII.

The two Obelisks of the Cirque Max.

The Obeliske (as Marcellinus testifieth) was a very huge & rough stone rising like a spire or broch, by little and little to a mightie height: and that it might resemble a raine or sunne-beame, it groweth smaller and smaller in fashion of a steeple, with foure sides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plaine and smoth right artificially. In most of them are engraven and cut certaine Hieroglyphicke notes, and namely such as testified either the founder thereof, or else other memorable matters. Of these figures and characters, the same Marcellinus speaketh in this wise: Moreover the infinite varietie of formes and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we see engraven, the aunient authoritie of the first learning did set forth and marke so. Thus much saith he. Now they drew and portraied therein divers and sundrie formes and shapes of living beasts and birds, and oftentimes devised new and strange resemblances, whereby they reserved and kept for their posteritie whatsoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Egypt onely, but also in other parts of the world, untill such time as letters were found: and then this was given over. At the first one letter emplied a whole word, and one word stood for a whole sentence. But hereof yee shall find much in authors that have written of these characters. Moreover, as Plinie witnesseth, these Obelisks were made of the stone Simichis. Them they erected & consecrated to the gods, and principally to the Sunne: and therefore in hewing and cutting them, they resembled the sunne-beames, as wee said before. The first that ever devised these Obelisks, was king Nechus. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from other parts, and so for beautifull shew and to wonder at were erected. Therefore in the Cirque aforesaid, called Maximus, two Obelisks were seene, one standing upright aloft, fourescore foot high: the other lying along in the Naumachie; it carried in length a hundred and thirtie foot and eight ynches, besides the base or footfall, which Augustus translated to Rome out of Hieropolis, a citie of Egypt: but when he would have set it up on end, it fell downe and brake in twain. This was hewen out of the quarrey, by king Sannefretens, in whose reigne Pythagoras was in Egypt.

CHAP. XV.

The arch of Serstinus in the Cirque. The place of the Tuberoes in the Cirque. The stewes, the house of Pompey, and the fountaine of Iuturna.

Serstinus having made conquest of Spaine, brought great store of money into the citie chamber: and of the spoiles taken from enemies, hee reared two arches; the one in the beast-market, called Forum boarium; the other in the great shew-place, named Circus maximus. Vpon these arches he set golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them.

The house and familie of the Helij was none of the welthiest, but yet of great credit and estimation with the Romans. Among whom there was so great concord and unitie, that 16 of them at one time dwelt and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their singular prowesse and worthe acts

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

acts, they were allowed by the Senat and people of Rome a scaffold by themselves in all the shew places and Theatres, to behold all fights and maistris of activitie.

About the Circus Maximus stood the stewes and brothel-houses, where sometimes harlots and naughtie packs kept, such as made profession of whoredome. But this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pompeius was neere the Circus Maximus, and therein was the statue of Hercules erected.

The fountaine or well of the nimph Iuturna, is yet (as some thinke) to be seen, boiling up in the Vellabrum neere the common sinke or vault called Maxima.

CHAP. XVI.

The Septizonium of Severus.

There should follow by course after the great Cirque; the sixth part of the citie, namely, the mount Coelius. But because wee meet with the Septizonium of Severus, and the arch of Constantine (before wee come to Coelius) betwene it and the mount Palatine, some thing would first bee spoken of them, especially being so excellent building as they are. The Septizonium therefore is a mightie mount or terrace raised from the plaine ground foure square, compassed about with seven circles, that is to say, courses or rews of pillars one above another, yeelding as it were as many porches or galleries: and in this order they are disposed, that the higher the pillars stand, the lesser and shorter they be. In the mids hereof, foure wals arise, containing within them certaine holow places like cabinets. In the top thereof were bestowed and laid the ashes of kings and emperours deceased. Iulius Capitolinus nameth this mount Septodium, for the Greekes call places much frequented, wherunto many waies lead, Heptodia of seve, i. seven, and dia, i. a way. Plinie calleth it Septifolium, of seven foits or folars. For in every course thereof the columnes meet together in the head with marbles transomes. Other beams there be besides, reaching withinforth from them to the mount it selfe, so as every such course yeelded a stage like a gallerie or walking place. Two of these Septizonia we read there were at Rome, to wit, the one of Titus in the street called Via nova, of right great antiquitie, not farre from this of Severus: of which at this day there is to be seene no shew or token at all. The other of Severus, whereof there remaine still, over against S. Gregories church three Zones or girdles (as it were) of curious worke; for the beautie and stateliness of the pillars worth the seeing, and pleasant to behold. Reared it was in the broad street called Appia, and built by Severus himselfe. That which now is left thereof, leaneth out so, as it seemeth ever and anon readie to fall.

CHAP. XVII.

The triumphant arch of Constantine the emperor.

These triumphant arches were erected for them onely, who having subdued whole provinces or conquered forraigne nations, and obtained brave and fortunate victories, seemed worthe of triumph, and thereupon they were called Triumphant arches. Vpon these arches for the perpetuall and everlasting memoriall of acts achieved, were cut and engraven the portraitures of the very places where the warre was performed; the resemblances of fabrickes and raunged battels, if the service was on land, and of ships, if it were at sea. Howbeit, untill the time of the emperors, no man raised any arches, and in Plinius daies they began first to be built: so as, that of Titus is of all others most aunient. For before their age, only statues and trophies were set up. But in proccesse of time following, many of these arches were raised: among which, that of Constantine is to be seen above the rest, at the corner of the mount Palatine, neere the Theatre, beautified with triumphall ornaments, and remaineth at this day in a manner found and whole without any hurt. This arch Constantine erected for himselfe, upon the victorie which he obtained over Maxentius at the bridge Milvius.

CHAP. XVIII.

Coelius the mount, and Coeliolus.

The mount Coelius in old time was named Querquetulanus, for the number of oaks there growing: but afterwards it was so called of one Calvus Vibennus, a duke of the Tuscane nation, unto who the Romans granted a place in that mountaine to inhabit. For when as the Tuscane people, by reason of their multitude, and the strong fenced places which they held, were suspected, commanded they were to remove into a street which of themselves was named Thuscus. But such as were without suspicion, kept the hill Coeliolus or Coelicolus, i. the little Coelius; a place where sometime the goddess Diana was worshipped: and at this day there standeth the church consecrated to S. Evangelista the virgine. This mountaine afterwards by Tiberius was named Augustus.

CHAP. XIX.

The temples of Faunus, Venus, and Cupid: the court Hostilia: the serraine campe: the house of the Lateranes: the pallace of Constantine, and Casorianus: the horseman statue of L. Verius.

VPon the ridge or side of the mount Cœlius there standeth a round church; now patronised by S. Stephen, but hallowed and consecrated in times past to Faunus. Faunus hee was called, Ἰσχυρὸς, i. for that hee foretold things to come, by voice and not by signes. The Albanes in old time inhabited that part of the hill, where at this day the church stands of S. Marie Dominick.

In the hill Cœlius stood sometimes the temples of Venus and Cupid, not farre from the gate Nævia, where now is the church of the holy crosse in Hierusalem.

The court Hostilia was in two places of Rome, the one in the common Rōrtm, hard by the temple of Peace, where K. Hostilius first dwelt, the other in that place, where afterwards the church of Saint Eln and Saint Paule was built.

A place there was in the mount Cœlius called Castra Peregrina, toward the Northeast and the Equilia, where at this time the church of the foure crowned Saints, is frequented.

The house of the Lateranes also was built upon the same mount, at the pallace or stately hall of the Lateranes.

The pallace of Flavius Constantinus, neere the house of the Lateranes, stood between the gates Cælimontana and Gabiula.

The pallace of Casorianus was built at the gate Nævia, and the church of S. Holy-crosse in Hierusalem.

In the street called Lateranenſis, stood the statue on horseback of L. Verius. Some say it was made for M. Lucius Antonius, others, for Septimius Severus.

CHAP. XX.

Of the Amphitheatres, and first of that of Statilius Taurus.

NOW it followeth to speake of the Amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus, but before we write thereof, it would bee briefly shewed what an Amphitheatre is. Now this word Amphitheatrum commeth ἀμφὶ θέατρον, i. of looking round about: for two prospectes joined in one, make the forme of an hemisphere or halfe circle. Some thinke, that Titus deuided the Amphitheatre first, but some avow and prove, that C. Cæsar built the first that ever was in Mars field: but by the authoritie of Suetonius it is proved, that Statilius reared one Amphitheatre before Titus.

In these Amphitheatres were prizes and rewards propounded to them that would fight with beasts. Condemned persons likewise yielded there to the eyes of men a horrible and fearefull sight to behold, for thither were those prisoners brought by the Licitors, within that enclosure to wrette and maintaine conflict with wild beasts.

Moreover, the emperours before they tooke their journey to any war or expedition, exhibited unto the people in these Amphitheatres shewes of sword-fencers at the sharpe for life and death, to the end, that the fouldiours should be acquainted with fight, and learne not to be affraid of weapons, of wounds, no nor of bloodshed, nor to draw backe and avoid the perils of warre to come, for the novelty and strangeness thereof. A great part of Statilius his Amphitheatrum, is yet to bee seene neere the wals, at S. Croſes church in Hierusalem. And at the same time hee built it, when Augustus Cæsar encouraged and exhorted the cittizens of Rome, every man according to his abilitie to beautifie and adorne the citie.

CHAP. XXI.

The water conduits why they were devised, by what means water were conueighed into the citie, to what purpose, by whom first, and how many.

THe citie of Rome in the beginning, as hath beene said in the first booke, was but narrow of compass, and contained within small bounds: and the people for commoditie and store of water, settled upon the river Tyber. But as the citie daily more and more encreased, necessarie it was that some should build them houses and habitation in one place, some in another, farther from the river: whereupon distressed it was for want of water, which was to be fetched so farre off, and that with great paine and labour: besides, those places which had no current of running waters to wash away the filth, and carie it into Tyber, became (by the noisome aire which was infected with their lothsome and stinking fumes) unhollome, and subject many times to the pestilence. Prince Nerva therefore

(the emperour) undertook to redresse and remedie this mischief (and others after him by his example) & devised by the wit and subtile invention of men, conduit pipes, to bring water into those parts of the citie which otherwise had none. And this verily they did two waies, the one by arched worke, when by digging certain rills or riverets, the water was carried leuell above ground, forced by certain weights, ballases, and counterpeiles: the other by vaults under the ground, bringing water into the citie by secret under-waies, through pipes, spouts, and rockes. By which means it came to passe, that in the citie every where, such store there was of water, that each house almost had a well in it. But especially at the bottome and foot of the hill Quirinalis, and all the side thereof, in the street Patricius, Suburra, the Latine way, the Aventine, the Iewes street, and in many other places: so as in this our age full it is of such waterworks under the ground. Now were these waters conueighed from divers places, & some conduits especially, such as were devised by arches, were higher or lower than other. In the beginning and all the former times, there were (by report) five heights or depths: The highest of all was new Anio; next, the waters Claudia; in the third place the water Iulia; Tepula in the fourth; then Martia, and after it old Anio, the leuell or current whereof, Virgo followeth and Appia, and the lowest of all others, Alficina, which serves that quarter of the citie beyond Tyber, & other low places built upon the plaine. These waters were first brought into certaine great conduit-heads, and from thence they were by a certaine measure distributed by the conduit officer, and so ran into places appointed. Now that great conduit-head was called Castellum, which receiveth first the common water, and afterwards sendeth it out into divers and sundry parts: and the keeper or officer that overseeth it, is named Castellarius. There were besides leuell or above ground, certaine cisternes or receptacles of water, which kept water to serve carriers, fullers, and other such artificers for their necessarie use. Over these waters were appointed certaine wardens and keepers, and a set number of labourers and workemen to see thereto. Finally, a greivous punishment was to bee inflicted upon them that either marred and hurt the conduit-heads, or derived and conueighed water to other places than the lawes and publicke ordinances, or the Censors or Ædiles permitted; or tooke more water than at the first was allowed them. Appian Claudius (by report) was the first man that brought water into the citie by arched worke. But of the Romane waters, of the conduits, and other matters ordained thereabout, of the manner of conveighance, the instruments, measures, and weights thereto belonging, read Frontinus, who of these things hath written truly and at large. Also have recourse to Sext. Rufus, who of the same argument hath made a good treatise. In the time of Frontinus there were but nine waters and no more brought into the citie, namely, Appia, old Anio, Martia, Tepula, Iulia, Virgo, Alficiana, called also Augusta, Claudia, and new Anio. Rufus reckoneth ten more, whereby it appeareth, that he wrote long after Frontinus.

CHAP. XXII.

The conduit or conveighance of Aqua Claudia.

Claudius began two conduits, but left them unfinished when he died, Claudius the emperour of famous memorie, tooke them in hand againe, and in most magnificent manner made an end. To the one of them, namely which beginning at the sources or springs called Cæruleus and Curtius, was drawne to the citie, he gave the name Aqua Claudia: the other, for difference sake of the two conduits of Anio, he called his own, or the new Anio; and distinct it was from that which is named old Anio. The water Claudia therefore was brought from the gate Nævia, along the side of the mount Cœlius into the Aventine. A part also thereof Caracalla derived into the Capitoll hill.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of those things which now in mount Cœlius are not knowne where they stood.

Rutius the Consull having expelled Tarquine, built a temple to the goddesse Cerna in mount Cœlius, to which goddesse also, upon the accomplishment of his praier and vow, hee offered sacrifice. They in old time supposed that she had power over the vitall members of the bodie, and to her tuition they committed those parts, and that shee should preserve them safe, they did sacrifice upon her altars, and presented oblations.

Agrippina likewise began to build a temple to Claudius Cæsar, which after her death Vespasian finished, and Nero utterly destroyed to the very foundation: this also was erected in the same hill.

Mamurra Formianus, maister of Cæsar's Carpenters in Fraunce, was the first Romane that adorned and set out his house which hee had in Cœlius hill, with marble rough-cast. Moreover, the house of Claudius Centimalus stood upon the said hill. Also the house of the Tetrici, who were two of the thirte tyrants. Likewise the house of Iunius Senatour, wherein, when as all other edifices and buildings upon that mountaine were consumed with fire, the image of Tyberius remained unhurt. There also is it is said of Titus Claudius Cyprius, the maker of hymnes. In this hill was the great Macellum, the cave or denne of Cyclops, the Spoliarium, and the arimorie.

CHAP. XXIII.

The waies Appia, and Nova. The temples of Isis, Vertue, Honour, Quirinus or Mars, and the river Almo.

NOW follow those places which are worth the remembrance upon the hill Caelius toward the Aventine. And therefore the way or street called Appia we meet with first, which taking the beginning from the arch of Constantine, reacheth as far as Brundisium: and because afterwards it was paved and repaired by Caracalla, it tooke the name of Nova, i. the new causey. But that which properly is called Nova, beginneth at the gate of Palatine, and along the foot of the Palatine hill, over the great Cirque called Maximus, stretcheth out as farre as to the lowest fish-pool, where now standeth the church of S. Sixtus. Many other streets there were, called Nova. Take heed therefore that in their names you be not deceived, and least yee thinke that to be spoken of one, which oftentimes was ment of many.

Betweene the church of Sixtus, the fish-pool, and the ruines of the Antonian baines, there was the church of Isis Antenorica, built by Antonius Bassianus.

The temple of Honour and Vertue, not farre from the street Appia, was vowed by the father of Marcus Marcellus at Clatidium in Gaul, and seventeene yeers after, dedicated by his sonne Marcellus.

Two temples there were of Mars, one called the temple of Quirinus within the citie, neere to the gate of that name, the other upon the way Appia without the citie.

The river Almo runneth along the way Appia, under the foot of the Aventine into the Tyber. It beginneth ten miles from the citie in the territorie Marinum, which commonly afterwards they called the river of Appia. In this river the goddess named the mother of the gods, was every yeere wont to be washed by her priests called Galli.

CHAP. XXV.

Of bathes and baines in generall.

THERMÆ properly hath the signification from a Greeke word, θερμῆ, which betokeneth hot. But wee use to call those places which either having hote waters, or without them are heat with a staph, appointed either to wash and bath, or to sweat, by the Greeke name Thermæ. That the Romans used in old to bath & wash themselves oftener, than we now adaies; is testified by many and divers authorities of writers: and for sundrie causes they were wont so to doe (as yet the manner is amongst us) namely to scour away sweat, or to wash dust off, in like sort for health & pleasure: whereby it came to passe, that every man, if he were but of mean wealth, had in manner a privat bath or hot house by himselfe: but the same were devised and contrived after diverse and sundry sorts. For many publick bathes there were ordained for the comon people to use at their pleasure. Serv. Orata invented first and made the pendant or hanging baths. But after that riot & superfluitie abounded in excesse, the bathing houses were built with wonderfull cost and magnificence, so as they seemed to keepe no meane nor measure: as appeareth by the very reliques and ruines thereof at this day. And those places where they built these baines and hote houses, they called Thermæ; which contained within them divers places, and an infinit number of rooms, bearing sundrie names, and serving to as many uses. For some were appointed to heat water (& those were round built) from whence hote water was let into the baines, not to them only that were on the ground beneath, but also to those which were pendant and hanging aloft: which water after they had done washing, being foule and good for nothing, was conveyed by certaine pipes and spouts into sinkes. They had other rooms also called Apodyteria, wherein they that were to goe into the bath, put off their cloths and laid them by. In the same places were court-yards, having about them most spacious porches or cloisters, built with arched and embowed routes most stately; wherein were marble pillars, garnished with divers and sundry colours. In like manner pavements of stone, and walls seeled and hung with marble tables. Also close walking galleries, groves, and swimming places, all for the pleasure and contentment of the people, where they might refresh and solace themselves. These delights so drew and allured mens minds, as that they would wash oftentimes in one day, yea, and in these baines the princes were wont to sup and bath with other persons whosoever, as it fell out. They had besides private bathes to themselves most sumptuously built, and gorgeously set out. And namely Antoninus Caracalla, at his owne charges edified certaine bathes, which by his name were called Thermæ Antoninæ. The huge ruines thereof are yet to be seen: some of the pillars still stand, others are throwne down. Some day, they were begun only by Antoninus, but finished & adorned by Sextus. They stood about the foot of the Aventine, neere the streetway leading to Ardea, where now is the church of S. Balbina. Under these bathes ther stood a most goodly palace, built by the same Antoninus, but at this day there is scarce any example or shew thereof.

THE FIFTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

The etymologie of the mount Aventine.

He Aventine is of the Roman hills the fourth in order. The compasse and forme whereof, because wee have already described in the first booke, needlesse here it is to repeat. But it remaineth to declare, how it came so called, what temples of the gods, and what other edifices be therein. The Aventine therefore, some thinke, tooke the name of birds which were wont to flie unto this hill, there to nestle: others, of a king of the Albanes, slaine and buried there. There bee againe who suppose, that the Sabines, who being by the Romans enfranchised citizens, there settled and made abode, gave the name to this hill, of Avantes, a river in their province. Varro affirmeth that it was so called of a ferriage: For as it hath been said a little before, this mount was divided from the rest, and from the citie by certaine lakes and the Tyber, whereupon, they that would goe to it, used to ferrie over in small punts or whirries. Some guesse, that it came to have that name of resort unto it, for that the Latines used in great frequence to repaire unto the holie temple of Diana there. Rémurius also it was named of Remus who chose a place in the top thereof to sit, for to take the flight of birds for Augurie, and in the end was there entered: Romulus therefore commaunded that it should not be inhabited, because hee would have had it wholly consecrated to his brother. This hill, Ancus Marcius afterward compassed with a wall, and granted leave to as many as would, there to dwell: howsoever there be some that thinke it stood void untill the time of Claudius the emperor of happy memorie, as being an ominous place and unfortunate, by reason of foule birds that haunted it, and therefore not to be received within the walls. But the truth is, when the Romanes grew populous, they joined this mountaine also to the rest of the citie.

* Aventinns.

CHAP. II.

The temples of Diana, Dea bona, Hercules Victor, queene Inno, Moneta, Luna, Victorie, Minerva, and Libertie. The altar of Iupiter Elicius.

IN the top of mount Aventine toward the Tyber, there standeth the church of S. Sabina, that every place where aforetime was the holy chappell of Diana. The feast and holiday of bond-slaves was wont to be kept at Rome the thirteenth day of August, for upon that day, Servius Tullius, whose mother was a bond-woman, consecrated a temple to Diana in Aventine, and ordained it to be a feastivall day for bond-servants, as who were patronised by Diana. Some thinke that this chappell was built by K. Ancus of that mony which the citizens conferred and contributed, who lately had been translated thither from Politorium. This temple was common unto all the Latines, whereupon oftentimes they resorted thereunto.

Very neere unto that place stood the church of Saint Marie, called Aventina. But in times past the place was consecrated to the goddess Bona, i. good. For Claudia a vestall virgine of Nun, built a chappell unto her in the honour of Fatna, sister of Faunus, a most chaste maid.

* or rather daughter.

Upon the same banke and brow of the hill, where at this day S. Alexius church standeth, was sometime the temple of Hercules Conqueror. And neere unto it, another of Inno Regina, built by Camillus with the pillage gotten in Vei. In the ruinate place of Decius the emperours baines, there was a temple also of Hercules, where the Christians afterwards consecrated a church to Saint Prisca.

On the side of the Aventine hill, stood the chappell likewise of the Moone, as Virgil dooth witnesse. Thus much of those buildings in the Aventine, which had a certain place thereupon in our knowledge: the rest following were doubtlesse in the Aventine, but in what part thereof they stood, it is unknowne after so long time, and namely the temple of Victorie built by the Arcadians, and in honor of whom they offer sacrifice yeerely. Minerva and Inno had their temples there in the same hill, by the testimony of approved authours. To Libertie a temple was built and dedicated by the father of Tib. Gracchus, with the money taken for fines and forfeitures. The cloister belonging to that temple, was by Elisus Petrus and Cornelius Cethegus Censors, repaired and enlarged, and last of all by Pollio also redified. Now this Saint Libertie the Romanes honored above all others, and in defence and maintenance thereof, they ever shewed themselves most resolute and constant.

Vpon

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Vpon the same hill, Numa reared the altar of Iupiter Elicius, so called ab eliciendo, i. of fetching out secrets and hidden mysteries.

In like manner there stood an old altar of Murcia in that hill. Now they named Venus Murcia, of the Myrtle tree consecrated unto her: or as some interpret, because Venus, immoderate and excessive, maketh a man to be Murcus or Murcidus, i. sluggish, slothfull, idle, and good for nothing.

The temple of Iuno Moneta was likewise built and dedicated upon that hill.

Camillus in the same mount consecrated a chappell to daime Matuta.

The wood or grove also called Laurentum or Laurentina, consecrated unto Iupiter, was there: in which, emperor Valentinian [the second] son of Constantine, & Galla Placidia was slain, as Plinie witnesseth.

CHAP. II.

Cacus, and his hole or cave.

Cacus, by report of the poets, was the son of Vulcan, whom they beleaved in old time to breach out of his mouth fire and smoke. This Cacus infested the places neere unto him with robbing and spoiling. But more probable it is, that he was a most leaud and theevish servant of Evandrus, and therefore the Arcadians called him κακός, i. naught. A cave he haunted, as by very good conjectures is certainly gathered, in Aventine toward Tyber, over against the church of S. Marie Aventine, whereas the river runneth neere to the hill, and whereas there hangeth over a vast and huge craggy rocke, as fit a place as might be, to make a starting hole and cave for such an one, and neere it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Hercules had killed and sacrificed, he reared an altar unto Iupiter Inventor, neere to the said cave or denne.

CHAP. III.

The Armilustrum, and some other things in generall.

Armilustrum was a place where soldiours shewed themselves and their armour, and where they used to muster; where also in their armes they sacrificed and did service to their gods, with resounding lowd trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Cirque Maximus; but that matters not much. Hither the soldiours, used to repair when they were returned from warre, and here they laid up their harness and weapons. For armour of their owne and in their private custodie the Romanes had not, to use in the warres: but delivered all up to be kept safe either in the Armilustrum, or the tower and castle upon the rocke Tarpeia.

In Aventine, neere the temple of Iuno Regina, were the Scala Gemonia, that is to say, a steep place with a downefall; where wicked malefactours, drawne with a crooke, were most miserably executed and killed.

There stood sometime upon this hill, neere the temple of Diana, the house of Phyllis.

A part of this mountaine was called Remuria; which Remus chose to dwell in: and being there by his brother Romulus committed to earth, he gave it his name.

The Senate and people of Rome built in this mountaine, to the honor of Decius the emperor, the bathes called Decianæ, and others also neere them, named Varianæ. Moreover, the baines of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Frauncis Albertinus is.

The caves of Faunus and Picus also, were in the Aventine, as fables report. Italus likewise dwelt in the Aventine, as M. Cato recordeth.

The temples and edifices of this hill all in generall, were (by report) burnt in the daies of Tyberius, sometime emperor.

CHAP. V.

The sheard hill, and other things within that compasse.

The plaine and leuell ground betweene Aventine, Tyber, and the citie wall, hath foure sides, but uneven; in which there riseth a little hill, commonly called Testaceus. The whole compasse hereof will hardly be measured with two thousand paces; the heighth is about 160 foot. It resembleth in shew the forme of a gourd; and the one side of it which regardeth the Tyber, is broader than the other. Neere to this hill, was the glassmakers street (and the potters) also the carpenters habitation. And no man doubteth, but hereupon arose and grew the mount called Testaceus. For in old time, at Rome and elsewhere, as also in some places now adaies, much use there was commonly of earthen vessels made by potters: which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numas daies, there were foure colleges or societies of potters: and these made of clay, not only vessels, but also the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and set out their temples: pillars and walls were by potters worke seled in the outside, nay, the very dead bodies were bestowed in cophins of baked clay. Since then then, in so great store of earthen vessels and potters worke, much of necessitie must needs be broken, which if they had been cast abroad in the corne field and pasture grounds, would have made all barren and unfruitfull; againe, if they had been throwne into the water, would in time have choked up the channell of the current, and forced the river to swell and overflow the bankes: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to fling all that was good for nothing, as filth, rifferaffe, and broken sheards, into one place: whereupon, in proceesse of time arose a mount which they called Testaceus. Among these potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Hyrtæa, as we find in some records.

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

CHAP. VI.

The Pyramides: the sepulchre of C. Cestius, and the garners of the people of Rome.

The Pyramides were huge towers foure square, rising up in height, sharpe like to a flambe, whereof they have the name ἀπὸ πυρός, i. of fire. But Stephanus supposeth they were so called, ἀπὸ τῆς πυλῆς, i. of wheat, because into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of all Egypt, which made a great dearth of corne. These at the beginning were reared by the kings of Egypt, thereby to spend and consume their superfluous wealth and substance, whereof they had nouse; for feare least if they had gathered good, and heaped up a deale of gold, silver, and other riches, they should thereby have given occasion unto some for to lie in await to take their lives away: also, that the common people should not live in idlenesse. Afterwards, at Rome likewise they bestowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to shew their vaine-glorie. There is yet one of them to be seene, standing upright at the gate Hortiensis, enclosed within a wall. And commonly it is said, that it was the monument or sepulchre of C. Cestius, one of the seven Septemvirs, called Epulones. But Blondus would seeme to prove, that it was the place for burial of the whole college and societie of those Septemvirs Epulones. Now were they called Epulones, who had the power to ordaine and make feasts and solemne bankets to the gods.

It is writtē, that there were 140 garners of the people of R. between the mount Testaceus & Tyber.

In the same compasse of ground neere Tyber, was the lake or poole Hylerna.

Some also affirme that there stood sometime in that quarter a little towne called Capena.

CHAP. VII.

The sweating steeple, and the image of Iupiter.

By course, the Esquilæ should next follow: but because it lieth between the way Labicana on the Southeast side, and the valley (which for the breach of 400 foot encloseth that way) on the West; we will rehearse what memorable things soever there bee in the Labicana way and the valey aforesaid, before we come to the mount Esquilæ. In our returne thereto the triumphall arch of Constantine, whereof we spake before, we will as we go, discourse of the rest. Neer then unto this arch, there appeareth the halfe rundle or circumference, of an old steeple made of bricke, which Vichor calleth the sweating steeple: for that the report goeth, how sometime there gushed water out of it; whereby the common people standing to behold the games and plaies in the next scaffolds of the Theatre untill they were a thirst, quenched their drought.

In the top hereof stood the brasen image of Iupiter, because their auncestours in old time were wont when they made solemne leagues to use the image of Iupiter. But for that it was a trouble either to carie with them or to send for the said image, especially if they were to contract and establish any accords in farre remote countries, therefore instead of the complete image they took the seapter only; which might betoken Iupiter the K. of the gods, as well as if he had been there present full & whole.

CHAP. VIII.

The Amphitheatre of Titus Vespasianus. The temples of Fortune and Quies.

Between the two hills Cælius and Esquilæ was there an Amphitheatre. This, Vespasian built first, and afterward Titus his sonne dedicated and beautified it with the baines, built neere unto it with right great celeritie and speed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Colosseum, of Neroes Colossus, which was set up in the porch of Neroes house. In the same place of the Theatre were the pooles beforetime of Nero, whereof we wil speake hereafter in this very booke. This Amphitheatre they called also Arena, i. the Sand-floore, because the ground was spread over and laid with sand, that the wrestlers might fall softer & take lesse hurt, also that the bloud should be drunk up to the end that the sword-fencers in combat might not be afraid upon the sight thereof, and so with lesse cheerefulness and courage set upon their concurrent: and last of all, that the champions, whose bodies were annointed with oyle, being bestrewed with the sand, might with more ease take hold one of another. The whole Theatre and place it selfe within, (which during those daies of the games was covered over with tent cloth) would receive eightie thousand men. But hereof see more in Plinie, Pomponius Latius, and other writers of the Roman acts.

Fulvius

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Fulvius Flaccus built unto Fortune (fast by this Amphitheatre) so goodly a temple, as for state and magnificence there was hardly another in all Rome comparable unto it. Besides it, there were many other chappels at Rome consecrated to Fortune.

Likewise a chappell of Quietusse and rest, was built in the broad street Labicana.

CHAP. IX.

Of Esquilie.

 He mount Esquilie, as well by Vatro as others, is devided into many parts, and each part thereof tooke name of those captaines who in times past before the citie of Rome was built, there inhabited. For one was called Cispius, another Oppius, and a third, Septius. But hereof Vatro writeth at large. The posteritie following changed those names, as we shall hereafter heare. Some thinke that Esquilie tooke the name of Excubie, i. watch and ward. For when Romulus had no very great trust in Tatius, he used to have a standing watch by night, for feare hee should bee secretly forsaid and killed, or els turned out of his kingdome. Others suppose it was so named of fowlers, who there used to cast forth chaffe and such refuse of light corne, to beguile and catch the poore birds.

The side of the hill toward the broad way Labicana, which now lieth between the churches of the fortie martyrs, of S. Clement, S. Peter in Vinculis, and S. Martin, was called by the name of Carina, as Livie seemeth to testifie. From that part therefore, because it was first inhabited, we shall doe well to begin our treatise.

CHAP. X.

The Carina, the old Curia and the new.

These Carina, according to their modell and forme were houses like to keeles of ships, standing within the temple of Tellus. Their ruines are yet to be scene neere the church of S. Peter in Vinculis, i. in bonds.

Neere to that place was the old Curia built by Romulus: but the new was erected neere to Comptum Fabricium, i. the Quairefour or crosse way of Fabricius.

CHAP. XI.

The baines of Titus and Philip: the statue of Laocoon: the palace of Vespasian: the houses of Balbinus and Pompey.

Here remaine yet to be scene the tokens and prints (as it were) of Titus the emperours baines, not farre from the church of S. Martin in the hills: for there bee great cisternes to receive water, which at this day be called Septem Salæ, according to the number of those cisternes: and so far reached the house of Nero, called Aurea, i. golden.

Not farre from thence, in the yeere of our Lord 1506, one Felix a cittizen of Rome, chaunced to find in his vineyard the statue of Laocoon, made by those excellent workemen, Agassander, Polydorus and Athenodorus, Rhodians, who with wonderfull cunning portraied and cut most artificially in one entire stone, Laocoon himselfe, his children, and the admirable windings and foldings of the serpents about them. And now at this day it is to be scene at the Vaticane, in the palace of Vespasian, neere the said baines of Titus. See more of this you may in Plinie. As for the storie it selfe, most learnedly and lively it is set out by Virgil, and there to be read. Behind these baines of Titus, betwene East and North, the ruines of others besides, are thought verily to be those of Philip the emperour.

Above the baines of Titus, some set Hadrians baines; for that this place is yet called Hadrianelus.

By the testimonie of Lampidius it appeareth that Balbinus his house was in Carina. There also was Pompeius house, in which Lenaxus his freed-servant taught grammar.

CHAP. XII.

The cliffe Virbius, the house of Servius Tullius, the golden one of Nero, and that of Virgil. Mecenas his tower and hortyards: the temples of Fortune and Felicite.

That part of the Esquilie which overlooketh the church of Saint Lawrence in Fontana, is named Clivus Virbius: there also is the grove Fagutalis, wherein stood the mansion house of Servius Tullius.

Neroes

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Neroes house, called Golden, tooke up all that space, which from that quarter wherein now Saint Gregories church standeth, lay betwene Constantines arch, the Colosseum, the Carina, Esquilie, and Mecenas hortyards. His house before was in his owne fire wherewith he burnt the citie, consumed also: and when he reedified it anew, hee called it Aurea. The spacious largenesse whereof was such, that it had about it, three porches of a mile compasse apeece. It contained also a poole like another sea: walled it was about, and resembled a very citie. There were to it belonging, holts and hamlets cuntry-like, vineyards, pastures, woods, and beafts both tame and wild, of all forts. The house and the porches were double gilded all over, and set out with pretious stones. And in one word there was nothing wanting, that might serve for pleasure or prodigall riot.

In the entrie of this house there stood an huge image giantlike, called a Colossus, 120 foot high. After Neroes death, dedicated it was to the Sunne, and then changed the name. Now men thinke it was called Colossus, after his name who was the first deviser of all such statues.

VVithin the same house, Nero included also the chappell of Fortune. This goddesse being made of the stone Phengites, when all the dores were shut, gave light to the whole house within; such raies of radiant brightnesse casteth this kind of stone from it. This goddesse, Servius Tullius first consecrated, and of Segetes, i. standing corne, called her Scia.

At the baines of Diocletian, there is a street-way leading up to S. Antonies church in Esquilie, where stood sometime a most noble towre of Mecenas, within his owne hortyards: for those most pleasant hortyards were in the plaine of Esquilie. Here-within was Priapus worshipped: upon which ill favoured idoll, Virgil hath plaied much in verse.

Neere the hortyards of Mecenas stood the said Virgils house.

The temple of Felicite, which tooke up a part of that plot where Neroes Gold-house should stand, was by him burnt.

Above those gardens or hortyards of Mecenas, was raised a wonderfull peece of worcke, called Aggeres Tarquinij Superbi, i. Tarquinus bulwarkes.

CHAP. XIII.

The pallace of Sisiminius: the plaine and market place of Esquilie: the grove Querquetulanus: also that of Iuno Lacinia, and of Mars: the chappell and altar of ill fortune.

The pallace of Sisiminius in Esquilie, stood (as they say) where the church of Saint Maric the greater now is.

The plaine or field Esquilium, neere the tower of Mecenas (called Intermontes) i. among the hills, is betwene the foresaid bulwarkes and the citie wall. This plot of ground was in times past called Foculus; because dead bodies were therein burnt. But when the stinking steeme thereof was noisome to the citie, the citizens and Augustus Cæsar by a generall consent, gave the said field unto Mecenas, where he made his goodly hortyards and most daintie gardens. Of which, Cicero with other, speaketh much.

In like manner, the market place Esquilinum, was in the same hill.

That side of the Esquilie which looketh toward the grove Querquetulanus, had in it the grove of Iuno Lacinia.

In the same Esquilie, was the chappell and altar of ill fortune.

In the way which goeth to the gate Interaggeres, even in the verie bulwarks or rampiers of Tarquinius, stood the arch of Gordian made of marble, garnished also and set out with ornaments of triumph. Of the ruines thereof, was S. Gregories church in Damafus built.

CHAP. XIII.

The cliffe Suburranus: the arch of Galenus: the shambles or flesh market of Livia, or as some would have it, Livianum: the Pranestine way, and the Trophees of Marius.

At the top or upper end of Suburra, was the Clivus Suburranus, so called of Suburra, yeelding an easie ascent from thence up into the Esquilie.

Anon you meet with the triumphall arch of Galen the emperour (where now standeth the church of S. Vitus) making a goodly shew of the Tiburtine stone, whereof it was made. Neere unto it was the shambles or market place called Marcellum Livia, or Livianum. This, as some thinke, tooke the name of one Macellus; who being a notorious thiefe, and practising much to steale in the citie, was in the end apprehended, and by the Censors condemned: and his house being seized as confiscate to the citie, was converted to a place wherein they sold meate and all other victuals; and so it kept still the name (as is said) of Macellum. Some are of opinion, that the said house was pulled downe, and another built in the ruines thereof, which retained the name still of the former.

From hence beginneth the port-way Prænestina, and leadeth to the gate Esquilina.

In this way you shall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick, halfe ruinate; upon which were erected two Trophees of marble; that is to say, certain posts [like Quintins] standing upright with spoiles of enemies hanging thereupon; and they resembled men that were taken prisoners. It is said, that these Trophees were set up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbric warre: which when Sylla had cast downe and overthrowne, C. Caesar (afterwards Dictator) erected againe. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbrum. As touching Trophees, looke to read more in Plutarch, Valerius Max. and others.

CHAP. XV.

The house of the Aelii: the chappell Marianum: the region or quarter called Tabernola: the baines and dwelling house of Gordian: the palace of Caius and Lucius: also the pallace Licinianum.

The house of the Aelii stood in that place, where now be the monuments Mariana and the chappell of that name.

The plaine part of the Esquilæ, betwene it and the mount Caelius, and the Basilica Laceranensis, is at this day called Merulana, for Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola.

Nere the Church of S. Eusebius in the way Prænestina, was built the baines and habitation of Gordianus. The ruines of those hot-houses are yet to be seene, whereby a man may soone give an estimate, how faire, how stately, and large they were at first.

Betweene the gates Esquilina and Nævia, not farre from the walles, there be to be seene certaine notable ruines: this they commonly call, the baines of Calpurnius. But in that place stood in old time, that beautifull and famous pallace which Cæsar erected under the name of Caius and Lucius his nephewes. Hard by the church of S. Balbina, whereas now is the Beare called Pileatus, stood sometime the pallace Licinianum.

CHAP. XVI.

The water Martia or Trajana: and the temple of Isis.

The current of the water Martia, passing by the gate Trajana through the plaine of Esquilæ, went as farre as to the baines of Diocletian, unto the hills next adjoyning. This in old time was called Aufera. It ariseth out of the spring Piconia in the mountains of the Peligni, and passeth by the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and so runneth to Rome; the coldest and most wholesome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water, Ancus Martius began first to bring into the citie: afterward, Q. Marius surnamed Rex, tooke it in hand; and a long time after, Agrippa repaired the conduit thereof. Of it, read more in Plinie and Frontinus.

The temple of Isis, is by P. Victor placed in the quarter Esquilina.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Suburra: the house of Cæsar and Lelia; and the street Patricius.

Suburra is a street of all other most frequented: it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth on forward directly by the Forum Nervæ, up to the hanging or rising of the hill called Clivus Suburranus, whereof wee have written before in this booke; and it endeth where the way Prænestina beginneth. Called it was Suburra, either for that it sustained and bare up the Carinae and the wall under it: or because it lay under the old citie; or as Varo thinketh, of the burrough or street Succufanus. In this street Suburra, was the house of Cæsar, so long as he contented himselfe with a mean estate.

In it were sometimes certaine stewes and brothell-houses, as Martial writeth.

The street Patricius windeth crooked from the hill Viminalis, and endeth at the baine of Diocletian. Of it, more hath been said in the former booke.

The house of Lelia likewise was in the same street, as Martial witnesseth.

CHAP. XVIII.

Suburra in the plaine; and the temple of Sylvanus.

The mount Viminalis on the West side of it, hath part of the Quirinalis opposite against it: and the vale lying betwene, was named Suburra the plaine.

In

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

In the same valley in times past, were the ten Tabernæ; so called of the number.

The pit also of Saint Proba was in the same hill; which Proba her selfe made nere to the Church of S. Maries in the field.

At the foot in manner of the hill Viminalis, over-against S. Agathæ church, there stood the temple of Sylvanus, as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the hill Viminalis: the pallace of Decius: the laver of Agrippina: the baines of Olympias and Novatus: the dwelling houses of Q. Catulus, Crassus, and C. Aquilius.

Arro reckoneth the hill Viminalis among the Esquilæ. Viminalis it was cleped, of Iupiter Viminis, whose altars were in that hill: or else of plentie of oifers there growing.

In the highest rising and ascent of that hill, there stood in old time, (where now is the church of S. Lawrence in Panisperna) the pallace of Decius the Emperour, as may be shewed by the ruines thereof.

Not farre from the same place, toward the church of S. Vitalis, were the lavers or washing places of Agrippina mother to Nero.

The baines of Olympias were situate toward Suburra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewise the baines of Novatus, were built upon the hill Viminalis, where the church of S. Prudence standeth.

The hill Viminalis, had also three goodly houses of most noble personages, to wit, of M. Crassus, Quintus Catulus, and Caius Aquilius: the markes whereof are evident to be seene in the side of the said hill.

Vpon the same hill in times past, a certaine festivall sacrifice was solemnized, which the dwellers and inhabitants there, call Fagurall.

CHAP. XX.

The baines of Diocletianus: the Librarie Vlpia: the plaine Viminalis: the gate Interaggeres: and the vale Quirinalis.

The baines of Diocletian are to be seene all ruinate on the side of the hill Viminalis: and by their ruines, a man may easily gather how stately and magnificent they were sometime. These were begun by Diocletian and Maximian Herculanus: in the building whereof 40000 Christians were held to worke many yeeres together in most slavish manner.

These were afterwards finished and dedicated by Constantine and Maximian, new emperours. Of the vaine and superfluous expences which the Romanes laid out upon Baines, read Seneca, who deprecate out their wastfulness most excellently.

In the same baines was the Librarie Vlpia, which by Hadrian, or (as some thinke) by Trajan, was thither translated; wherein were the linnen records, and those huge volumes called the Elephantine bookes: in which the acts of the Emperours, and all the sanctions and ordinances of Senate, were, as Pollio witnesseth.

Behind these baines, from above the rampier or bulwarke of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plaine field Viminalis, which spreadeth out as farre as to the citie wall. There is seene as yet the gate Interaggeres shut; albeit it seemeth more probable and like to a truth, that it stood in the plaine Esquilina.

In that verie place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby, called the pit of the Vivarium, or the parke pit, within which parke they kept enclosed divers and sundrie kinds of wild beasts. The harbours and denes of these wild beasts are yet to be seene: whereupon it cometh, that those places or parkes which are set out and appointed for feeding of Deere, we use to call Vivaria.

The space betwene Diocletian's bathes and Constantine's arch, is named the vale Quirinalis: in which they say, that Romulus met with Proculus.

In the same was the sacred chappell of Fortuna Publica.

CHAP. XXI.

The mount Caballus: the etymologie of Quirinalis: the tower Militarium: the baines of Paulus: the chappell of Neptune: the baines of Constantine: the house and street of the Corneli.

THe hill which at this day they name Caballus, was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many signes and reasons may be proved; so as no man skilfull in the Romane storie, need to doubt thereof.

This Quirinall hill, the sixt in order of the mountaines of Rome, (as I have testifieth) taketh that name of the temple of Quirinus: after others, of the Quirites, who comming with Tatius from Cures, there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountaine is shapd long, for it comprehendeth that little hill which is betweene the gate Collina and Collatina. Vpon it standeth the Obeliske of the Moone, engraven with Egyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower, now called Comitium.

In the pitch and top of the hill, above the Forum of Trajanus, you shall see the tower called Militarium; where, in old time the souldiers of Trajanus kept their standing guard, and gave the tower that name.

On the sameridge were the baines of Paulus built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagnana-Poli.

In the descent and hanging of the Quirinall hill toward Suburra, stood sometime the chappell of Neptune, which appeareth by the pictures and other reliques there found.

From hence toward the North, were the hot-houses of Constantine, as the ruines of the place doe testifie.

The house of the Corneli was built in the street so called, and at this day the name it keepeth still. But more hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The temples of Saturne, the Sunne, and Bacchus: Quirinus his temple and porch: the old Capitoll: the chappels of Iupiter, Iuno, and Minerva: the house of Pomponius Atticus.

IN the Cornelian street (whereof a little before wee made mention) were two gyant-like images, called Colossi, resembling two old men, naked, and holding Connecopia in their hand. It is commonly received, that these were the statues of Saturne and Mars; for that certain it is how their temples stood hard by: and many evidences there are, besides the verie ruines thereof, which testifie so much.

Over-against the hot-houses of Constantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be seene one halfe of a marble tower, which the people dwelling therby, call * Mesa. This men thinke, was the tower of the Sunne, by the ornaments there reared and set up by Aurelian: for this Emperor worshipped the Sunne above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coine this inscription; SOLI INVICTO, TO THE INVINCIBLE SUNNE. His mother also, a priest of the Sunne, thereupon reared a temple unto the Sunne.

In the side of the hill neere the foresaid bathes, are two horses seene standing; the handy-woke of Traxiteles and Phidias. These were (by report) Traxiteles the kings, and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinalis which boundeth upon Vallis Martia, was called the mount and temple of Clara and Apoll.

Not farre from thence, behind this hill, there is another rising and ascent; where, by antique letters it is evident, that the old Capitoll stood, together with the chappell of Iupiter, Iuno, and Minerva.

Over-against these places, enclining toward the right hand, where now standeth the church of Saint Vesalis, Pomponius Atticus dwelt in an house which came to him by inheritance from his grandfather, and was called Pamphiliana. They write, that this was a most sweete and pleasant seat, by reason of a wood neere unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the temple of Quirinus, kept alwaies shut, to signifie that it was an unknowne secret; whether Romulus were entered, and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in heaven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name; where folke used commonly to meet, to dispatch busineses and contract espousals.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIII.

The path way or caufey called Alta; the house of Sabinus: the street and statue of Mamurris: the court and gardens of Salust, and the field or plaine Sceleratus.

THe high caufey reaching from the bathes of Constantine to the gate Viminalis along the side of Quirinalis, was paved with foure square stone.

Vpon that caufey, at a place called the Pomgranat, Flavius Sabinus had an house, wherein by report Domitian was borne.

It is avouched that in old time ther was a street of Mamurris: and that his statue there stood, where now is S. Susans church.

Not far from that church, was the court of Salust, and his most neat and fine hortyards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached neere the gate Collina. Of those hort-yards, as also of the hamlet Tiburtina, there yet continue some markes and remnans in the bottome of the valley, betweene the very hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Salaria. On that little hill is seene the very house of Salust, which the people there inhabiting call Salutrium. Of this matter, see more in Cicero and others.

Beyond the hort-yards of Salust, neere the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount: where in times past the vestal votarie Nuns, such as were condemned for incontinencie and incest, were buried quicke; and thereupon all the plaine about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thereto.

CHAP. XXIII.

The temples of Salus, of Ius, Fidius, of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus: also the Senate house of women.

THe mount Quirinalis had very many temples and chappels, although the certaine place where they stood is not so well knowne at this day, namely, one of Apis. That of Salus was painted by Fabius Pictor, and burnt in the time of Claudius. By Iunius Bubulcus Dictator when he triumphed over the Aequians, it was vowed: by him (Censor) put out to making, and in his second Dictatourship dedicated.

* Sanctus, Ius, and Fidius, were the Sabine gods, which, when they left their native countrey and home, with all their other household gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis. This god (forsooth) was in words and name three, in deed and truth but one, as they said. These three therefore had one temple built them upon this hill, and were called by one name Sanctus. The opinion received of which godhead, was such, that an oth was thought to carie a great power of sanctitie and holines, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deitie, avowed and swore thus, Me-Dius-Fidius.

Domitianus a Pretour or lord cheefe justice within the citie of Rome, built a temple upon that hill, to Fortuna Primigenia.

Besides, in that mount were the temples of Honor and Hercules.

Likewise the counsell house of women was in the mount Quirinalis, at which in former times the wives and dames of the citie met yeerely upon certaine solemne set daies.

Moreover it is recorded that the feast Agonalia was celebrated in Quirinalis.

CHAP. XXV.

The court or Forum Archimonium: the pillar Tiburtina: the house of Martial: the Cirque of Floralia: the temple of Flora: the shops of Minimus, and the common ascent called Clivus Publicus.

Betweene the hill Hortulorum (whereof yee may read before in the first booke and the chapter next following) and Quirinalis, there is a valley foure square, but lying out somewhat in length. In that part thereof which lieth under the mount of Clara and Apoll, was the court called Archimonium. For the very church of S. Nicholas, which at this day standeth upon that place, is named De Archimonijs.

Not far from it there is another place, to wit, Pila Tiburtina: There stood the house of Martial, as hee himselfe witnesseth.

Next to it followeth the round Cirque (Floralium) where yeerly to the honor of the goddesse Flora, the the feastvall Floralia is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous courtizan or strumpet at Rome, who having by her whorish trade gathered a mightie deale of goods together, in her last will made the people of Rome her heire, with this condition, That every yeer they should celebrate the memoriall of her birth day. But the Senate thinking this a ridiculous mockerie, to honour and dignifie so filthie a thing with such a remembrance, they devised a goddesse of floures forsooth, called Flora, and her upon those holydaies they seemed to please and content, that there would be good to the growth of trees and corne, and that they might doe well in their floueing and bloueing time. To this goddesse, wee read that a temple likewise was consecrated. Anon you meet with the workehouses where they make Minium, i. Vermilion. Neere unto which was the Clivus Publicus.

* Deus Trino:

CHAP. XXVI.

The hill Hortulorum, the temple of the Sun, and the sepulchre of Nero.

His little hill (Hortulorum) containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the house of Pincius a Senatour, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountaine, which in these daies are called, Mount Pincius, and gate Pinciana.

The reliques and markes of his house are seene in that very place, neere the old wall. And about the same walls we meet with an huge building in forme of an hemisphere or halfe circle, which men imagine, was the temple of the Sunne.

Vpon the same hill over-against the tombe of Marcellus in the very port way Flaminia, fast by the monument of Domitian, stood Neroes sepulchre also.

Now this hill Hortulorum tooke the name of certain hortyards and gardens under it, which in old time, by reason they were continually so well watered, were most fruitfull. Downe this hill, all they were wont (in times past) to descend into Campus Martius, who meant to sue and stand for any magistracie.

THE SIXTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the flat plot of the citie, and the Theatre in generall.

That it may bee understood more certainly, in what place of the plaine and leuell part of the citie every thing stood, let there bee a streight and right line drawne from the Capitoll, through Pantheon to Tybre, neere the church of Saint Roch. So shall the citie bee in manner divided into two equall parts. The one shall lie from the front and side of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flumentana, along the foot of the two hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcellus, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done. As for Theatrum, a Greek word it is, and in Latine may be aptly translated Visorium. The first Theatres were appointed among the Athenians, and those in regard of husbandmen, who on feastvall daies visited the temples of the gods: afterwards, at Rome they began to bee taken up. The first, and that the greatest of all others, was built of timber by M. Scævus: for, the concavities within would receive fourescore thousand men. After it, were Theatres made to turne about and shew their front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, see more in Cassiodorus and Vitruvius, who have written plenteously thereof, and namely by whome they were first ordained, and in what manner built.

CHAP. II.

The Theatre of Marcellus and the Librarie: the gallerie and court of Octavia.

Augustus built many things under the name of others, as wee find it written by authours in many sundry. And among the rest was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or cousin by his sister Octavia. A part

A part hereof is yet to bee seene betwene the Capitoll and Tyber, where now standeth the pallace of the Sabelli. It was able to containe eightie thousand men. See more thereof in Aconius.

Hard by the very same Theatre was the gallerie of Octavia, reared by the said Augustus for his sister Octavias sake. Therein were certaine curious peeces of worke wrought by Praxiteles, and namely the ravishing of Proserpina. The portraiture of Bacchus and Satyrus. Also Apollo, Diana, and the nine muses, the workmanship of Timarchides. VVithin this gallerie or walking place, Plinius saith there stood a chappell of Iuno, and the image of the said goddesse. Fast by the said gallerie stood the court or pallace of Octavia, and in it Cupid portraied with lightening in his hand. It tooke up in times past as great a space, as at this day the churches of S. Nicholas in Carcere, and S. Marie in Porticu.

After the death of Marcellus, Octavia his mother set up a librarie neere his Theatre. Now the first that ever ordained, That bookes of all learning should bee in some publicke places bestowed for to beeread of all that would come; was at Athens Pisistratus the tyrant, and at Rome Asinius Pollio.

CHAP. III.

The Cirque or shew place Flaminius, and the temple of Apollo.

That this Cirque Flaminius stood in that place where at this day the darke store houses and sellers be, hard by S. Catharins church, the markes yet remaining testifie. Flaminius it was called, either because it was built about the plaine called Campus Flaminius, or else by Flaminius the Consul, who was slaine at the battell of the lake Thrasymenus. In it were the plaies and games exhibited, which they call Apollinares: and therein the horse-runnings were performed. To it the Senate used oftentimes to come downe from the Capitoll to sit in counsell. Neptune also had a chappell there.

Apolloes temple was in that very place, as it evidently appeareth, where now S. Maries church is under the Capitoll, betwene the hearbe-market and the Cirque Flaminius, neere to the gate Carnentalis.

CHAP. IIII.

The temples of Vulcane, Mars, Bellona, Hercules, and Iupiter Stator: the colonne or pillar Bellica: the altar of Neptune: the gallerie Corinthia: and the colosse of Mars.

Vithin the Cirque Flaminius stood most famous temples of the gods, to wit, of Vulcane, Mars, and Bellona, to wit that which was toward the gate Carnentalis. Before the said gate there stood a marble pillar, which the Romanes called Bellica, for it shewed when warre was to be made. The Romanes in old time used and retained this manner in proclaiming warre: The publicke beadle, or one of the heraults called Faciats, launced a speare with some other ensignes of warre, into that land upon which they meant to levie armes. But when after many conquests they had enlarged their empire and dominion, and that they were oftentimes to give defiance to nations farre remote and distant, because they should not need to sling a speare or javeline, as I said before, into that land, they did but sticke one in the pillar abovenamed, on that side which regarded that part whether they were to make their expedition.

To Hercules the Great, protectour and keeper of the cirque Flaminius, they built a temple in the same place: for his statue was there erected in the very entrance thereof, on that side where now standeth the church of S. Lucie in the darke Apothecæ.

M. Fulvius built another temple of the allowance that hee had of the Censours stocke, to Hercules Musarum: for hee had heard in Greece how Hercules was Musagetes, i. the leader and companion of the Muses. The same Fulvius translated the images of all the Muses out of the towne Ambracia to Rome, and consecrated them under the protection and safegard of that most potent and mightie deity, to the end that they might have mutuall helpe one of the other: namely, the quietnesse of Muses by the defence of Hercules; and the valour of Hercules, by the sweet voice of the Muses. This church much decayed and disfigured by time, Martius Philippus, Augustus his father in law, i. his mothers husband, repaired.

In the same Cirque they would have the temple of Iupiter Stator to stand.

There also (as they gather by certain presumptions) was the altar of Neptune, which in old time ran bloud.

Octavius reared a porch or gallerie, built & born up with brazen pillars, and therupon named Corinthia. This stood betwene the Cirque and S. Nicholas church, and was also called Chalcaria, i. brazen or copper.

The Colosse or stately image of Mars, at the cirque Flaminius, was in the temple of Brutus Callaisius.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

The porch or gallerie of Mercurie: the Theatre of Octavius: his house, cloister, and gallerie: and the temple of Venus Victrefe.

Betweene the Cirque Flaminius and the Tyber, in the very entrie of the church of S. Angel in Piscina, there is a porch or gallerie, consecrated sometime to Mercurie, or as some would have it, to Iuno. This being consumed with fire, L. Septimius Severus reedified. But the porch which standeth in the Iewes street called Ceura, they say was builded by the emperor Severus.

Betweene the gallerie of Marcellus and the mount reared by Hadrian, Pompey was the first that built a Theatre to continue. For all others before were taken down when the games and shewes were once done and past: and when need required, new were set up. A great part of this Theatre when Pompey had finished, comes Caligula and made an end of the rest. Afterward, Theodorick king of the Ostrogoths reedified it. This also received eightie thousand men.

Neere unto this Theatrum there was a court or stately hall called Atrium, the same which at this day they name Satrium; also the house of Pompey, and a porch before it. These edifices of Pompey, at what time as Philip exhibited the stage-plays, were consumed with fire. Neere to the same Theatre, the emperor Claudius of famous memorie, reared an arch of marble for memoriall of Tiberius Caesar.

In the foresaid Theatre (men say) was the temple of Venus the Victrefe.

CHAP. VI.

The baines Agrippina: Pantheon, and the porch thereof: also the temple of good speed.

From the arch of Pompey as you goe, northward, you shall meet with the baines Agrippinae, the fmarke whereof are seen in that place which now of the inhabitants there, is called Cyambella. Now, Agrippinae they were named of Agrippa who built them: See Plinie hereof in his Discourses of Nature.

Neere unto the foresaid baines, there is a temple of greatest antiquitie, and among other old temples of the citie, the noblest of al the rest, which at this day remaineth in maner whole and sound. Because it was dedicated almost to all the gods, they thought good to name it Pantheon. In form it was like the world, representing a sphere or globe. At this day they call it S. Mariae the round. Of this temple Plinie and others have made mention, unto whom I referre the readers. In the very porch and entrie of this temple, were the statues of Augustus and Agrippa. The images also of Mars and Venus. At the lappet of Venus care, there hung as a pendant that most costly and pretious pearle of Cleopatra. Likewise there stood the image of Minerva, the handiwork of Phidias. Moreover, Hercules; at whose statue the Carthaginians in old time used yeerely to sacrifice mankind. They ascended up into this temple as into the rest, by many steps: for men in times past used to reare their temples on high, and made but one way to goe into them. A porch to this temple Agrippa joined: a peece of worke worth all admiration, which of some was called Prothyron. For this word Porticus, betokeneth nothing els but an ornament or porch, prothyron before the dore. Hereof also have authours written much. This temple first Hadrian the emperor of happie memorie, and afterwards Antonius Pius, reedified.

Certaine reliques and remnants foure angled and somewhat long, of Good-speeds temple, are evidently seene in the streets of Minerva and S. Eustachius. This god was long ago worshipped, that all things might fall out happily in the end. Portraied hee was in habite of a poore man, holding in his right hand a charger, and in his left an eare of corne.

CHAP. VII.

The baines of Nero and Alexander: the Cirque named Agon.

Behind S. Eustachius church, betweene Pantheon and Lombards street, the remnants are seene of the baines and vaults of Nero.

Neere unto these, Alexander built others new (by conveyance of water into them, which they call Alexandrina) and those very faire and delectable: VVherof Lampridius hath written much.

Neere unto them (some thinke) were the bathes of Hadrian: and they would have them to stand in that very place, where now is S. Aloisius church.

In the plane part of the citie there appeare most evident tokens of a long and spacious Cirque, which they call at this day Agon. It took that name, either of the games Agonalia instituted by king Numa Numa in the honour of Ianus, which in that shew-place are represented, the ninth day of Ianuarie: or because all manner of such shewes and disports, called by the Greeks, Agones, were wont there to be exhibited. Some would have it to be built by Nero or Alexander, upon this reason, that other ornaments of theirs were to be shewed there. For the manner of their princes and Emperors was, ordinarily to bestow their monuments and memorials in one place.

CHAP. IX.

The temple of Neptune: Terentius: the altar of Dis or Pluto: the marish Caprea.

ON the strond of Tybre, where now S. Blas Church standeth, sometimes Neptunes temple stood. The same was rebuilt by Hadrian. Therein were the painted tables hung, which represented the shipwrackes.

Terentius is a place in Mars field, so called, for that in it the altar of Dis was hidden: or because the water of the Tybre running thereby, eat away and wore the bankes of that side: or lastly, by occasion of Evander, who arrived with a fleet in that place, and there abode. There also in time of the Albane warre, they hid the altar of Proserpina under the ground, that they onely might have knowledge thereof, where it was.

In the same Mars field (some thinke) was the fenne or marish Caprea, where Romulus in a tempest which sodainly arose, was taken away. Of which matter Livie writeth.

CHAP. X.

The house Corvina: the broad way or gate: and the temple of Isis.

THe second part of the flat citie, reacheth along the foot of Quirinalis, from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flaminia. In which part neere the Capitoll, was the house Corvina, built by that name and familie; and to this day keepeth still the old name; for commonly called it is Macellum Corvorum.

From that house unto the barres or railes in Mars field, extendeth the way Lata, retaining yet the antique name: and there standeth the church, named S. Mariae in the broad way.

In the same way, stood sometime by report, the temple of Isis neere the railes above-said, where now is the church of S. Macellus. Now this Isis was a goddesse of the Egyptians. Shee was honoured and worshipped also at Rome, together with Osiris surnamed Serapis: of whome the publicke plaies in the quarter Flaminia, Iteum-Serapeum bare the name. It happened in the temple of Isis that incest was committed; whereupon the Emperour Tybrius caused the priests of that temple to be crucified, and the place it selfe to be demolished. Other temples of this goddesse there were at Rome: for Caligula translated all her sacred rites and ceremonies to Rome, and daily with exceeding great reverence observed the same.

CHAP. XI.

The arch of Camillus: the temple of Minerva: and the swine market.

AS a man goeth downe from the broad-gate afore said toward the Pantheon, he shall see a most auncient arch. Some thinke (but untruly) that erected it was for Camillus: for many a faire day after his time, these arches were in no request and use: and therefore it belonged to some other L. Generall. Betweene this arch and Pantheon, Cu. Pompeius built a temple to Minerva, wherein he comprised in a compendious summe, the memoriall of all his acts and exploits. Other ensignes also in the honor of the citie of Rome, he there set up, and those he garnished and adorned. VVherof read Plinie.

At the foot of the mount Quirinalis, in the hortyards of the Columenses, neere the ascent and rising of the hill which leadeth now into the mount Caballus, there was sometime the market-place Suarium, so called of selling swine there. For Varo witnesseth, that in old time they had certaine set and appointed places for the selling of severall things, and thereof the markets tooke the name. Thus of oxen, the market Boarium; of fish, Piscarium; of swine, Suarium; of woorts or hearbs, Holitorium, was called. &c.

CHAP. XII.

Of the field called Martius, or Tyberinus.

FOrasmuch as in the former booke it hath been sufficiently declared as touching Mars field where it lay, it shall be needlesse to make any repetition thereof in this place: but why it was called Martius,

THE TOPOGRAPHIE OF ROME.

Martius, would be here in briefe considered. Named so it was, because it was consecrated to Mars: for when the Tarquines were expelled out of their kingdom, what ground soever or standing corne they were possessed of, they divided amongst those citizens who were not landed at all, reserving only this field Martius: which because it was consecrated to Mars, that in it their games and plaies should be solemnized and the youth exercised, they thought that the fruit also there growing should likewise be counted sacred and accursed, and so deemed it unlawfull that any distribution thereof should be made, but threw it all into the Tybre, whereof arose the yland called Tyberina; of which wee will speake in the last booke. In this field therefore (besides the native beautie of the place and the delectable sight of the medowes) were erected the ornaments and statues of brave and renowned persons: yea out of the very Capitoll (when the place began to be pestered and over-streight by reason of so many ornaments which thither were daily brought) many of them were from thence translated into Campus Martius. This field was called of men in old time, Tyberinus; like as Tybre also was named Martius.

CHAP. XIII.

The porch, the Temple, Colunne, and Pallace of Antoninus Pius: the railes or enclosure, called Ovilia.

Betweene the Sciarra and Pantheon streets, neere to Saint Stephens Church in Trullio, there sheweth a stately porch, which most men suppose was that of Antoninus Pius, for that his temple standeth so neere. The Colunne also of Antoninus is not farre off. This hee raised of an exceeding height with winding and turning staires, like that of Trajanus, whereof wee have spoken before. Between this Colunne and the porch or gallerie, the said emperor had (by report) a goodly pallace. Betweene the said Colunne and the water Virgo, they say, the railes or enclosure within Mars field stood, called Septa. Now this place was enclosed within wooden railes, and strongly fenced with posts on every side, wherein the people of Rome when at the creation and election of magistrates they were to passe their voices, were kept close: and for the resemblance of sheepe pennes, Ovilia of some they were called. By Livie they are set down, neere the waies Fornicata and Flaminia.

CHAP. XIII.

The hill Citatorum: the Villa Publica, temple of Neptune, and the bridge in Mars field.

Betweene Antonines Colunne and S. Lawrences church in Lucina, there is raised a mount, called now Citorius, for Citatorum; not that it was a mount in deed, but because the people of Rome when in the chusing of magistrates they were to give their voices, as they were cited went thither as it were into some hill. Some say it was called Acceptorum, of taking the peoples suffrages: others, Septorum, for the vicinite of those Septa before said. This little mount, there be that would have to rise and encrease by the ruins of some porch or stately gallerie: or els, of the common Hostellerie, called Villa Publica. For there was in time past a place called Villa Publica, a large building in manner of a court or hall; wherein were received and entertained all embassadours of enemies, who might not be allowed either to enter into the citie, or to goe into the publicke lodging or Hospitall called Græcostasis.

Neere to the Septa, M. Agrippa (as Denis writeth) built a goodly temple with a most beautifull porch to it, in the honour of Neptune.

At this foresaid hillocke called Citatorum, and the Colunne of Antoninus, there was a bridge fast by the Septa, whereupon they that were cited when they had given their voices, passed by and went their waies: and so were severed from the rest that were to give their suffrages, because they should not be entermingled amongst them, nor be able to shew unto them, on whose side they had passed their voices.

CHAP. XV.

The water Virgo: the lake and chappell of Inturna, as also that of Pietie.

The water Virgo, which reteineth still the pleasant sweetnes to the tast in drinking, & keepeth yet the old name, beginneth to gather to an head neere the bridge Salaris; and being carried in a most deepe gutter, entrench into the citie at the gate Collina, and so is raised to the hill Hortulorum: where, by arched worke it is conveyed through Mars field, and yeeldeth all the way to the inhabitants, water for their use; and endeth at the length in the hortyards of Lucillus.

Moreover in Mars field, there was (as men say) a fountaine and well or cistern of Inturna, sister of K. Tarnus, yeelding most holefome water. This water-Nymph, they avouch (and that right well) to have have been called Inturna, a juvando, i. of helping; because shee was thought to helpe the sicke. The very place is at this day by a corrupt word, named Lotreglio.

In the same Mars field, it is recorded, that in times past stood the temple of Pietie, even whereas now the church of S. Savior is.

CHAP. XVI.

The arch of Domitian: the obeliske of Mars field: the Amphitheatre of Claudius the Emperour.

The triumphant arch, so dismembred (as it were) and bereft of all the ornaments, standing betweene the churches of S. Sylvestre and Lawrence in Lucium, and taketh up a peece of the way or street Flaminia, is attributed unto Domitian the Emperour. And hereupon (besides other presumptions) they appropriate it to him, for that this emperour reared many such arches in every place.

The Obeliske also there is in this Mars field, which Augustus transported from Hieropolis a citie in Egypt, to Rome. Besides, the native ensigns and wonderfull hieroglyphick inscriptions which it brought with it of the owne, therein to be seene, Augustus adjoynd other ornaments no lesse admirable. But hereof it is better to read Plinie.

Claudius the emperour, built neere the Septa in Mars field an Amphitheatre, which he decked and adorned with faire statues and most beautifull colunnes.

CHAP. XVII.

The vale Martia: the pallace: the porch of Augustus: the Naumachie of Domitian: and the temple of the familie Flavia.

The vale Martia taketh the name of Campus Martius: it lyeth betweene Tybre and the hill Hortulorum: within which, in a place lower than all the rest about it, appeare the Naumachies of Domitian; where, in old time he exhibited shewes of navall fights. In which place before-time likely it is, that Augustus had his Naumachie; which being cleaned and scoured by Domitian, reteined afterwards his name. Read Suetonius.

Neere to this Naumachie, was the temple (as it is thought) of the kinred Flavia.

In this place, Julius Capitolinus prooveth, that the porch and pallace of Augustus was built.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Mausoleum of Augustus: and the two obeliskes neere it: also the tombe or sepulchre of Marcellus.

In the vale Martia, betweene the way Flaminia and the banke of Tybre, hard by S. Roches church, Augustus made a Mausoleum, to serve for a sepulchre as well to himselfe and all the Emperours, as also for his whole house and name. This building is like unto a turret standing at the gate called Populi, which sheweth it selfe spoiled now of all the ornaments that set it out. Men would have it to be the sepulchre of Marcellus. And Augustus named this sepulchre of his, Mausoleum, for the resemblance it had of that of Mansolus K. of Caria, which Artemisia his wife built for him. Read Cassiodore, Strabo, and others thereof.

Close unto the Mausoleum of Augustus, were two obeliskes, as the ruinate remnants thereof doe testifie.

CHAP. XIX.

The way Flaminia: the Trophees of Marius: and other goodly ornaments of the field Martius in generall.

Cneus Flaminius the colleague of M. Lepidus, having vanquished the Ligurians, paved the caufey or street Flaminia. This way led from Placence, through Narnia, Fuligneum, Nuceria, Callium, to Fortunes temple, to Pisaurum, and so forward to Ariminum. See Livie and Suetonius.

Betweene the Mausoleum of Augustus, and the hill called Hortulorum, were the Trophees of Marius over Jugurtha. Trophees, as Varro witnesseth, were so called of τροπή a Greeke word, which signifieth, flight; for that the manner was, to hang up the spoiles and disrobings of enemies put to flight and slaine, upon trunks and posts.

In Mars field, were the sepulchres of Sylla, Hirtius, and Pansæ, of Julia, Britannicus, Drusus, the Emperour Claudius, and other right hardie and valiant knights, beside infinite ornaments more, whereof we have written before in this booke.

CHAP. I.

Of the river Tybre.

* Or as some say,
the Aspinus.

TH should follow by due course and order, to treat of Ianiculum and all that quarter of the citie on the other side of Tybre: but because these parts are separate from the rest of the citie by the river Tybre betweene; thereof also it is meete to say somewhat briefly. And first verily the reason of that name would be shewed. Some thinke therefore, that the river was called Tyberis, son of Aspinus. For the Sicilians when as in old time they had overcome the * Carthaginians in battaile, and taken a number of them prisoners, enioyned them, for the better fortification of their owne citie, to cast a trench about it, and to let water thereinto: and this ditch in reproch of their enemies, they called Tiber. And the same men upon a time afterwards, when as they encamped neere Rome, gave this verie name unto this river also, whereas before it was called Albula. Some thinke it was named so of Tyberis a king of the Tuscaus, slaine upon the banks thereof. Vano is of opinion, that it tooke the name of Tyberius, a neighbour prince of the Vejentians. In holy writings we read it Tyberinus. In vulgar speech they call it Tyberis: in poetrie, Tybris. In old time it was tearmed Rumon, as it were, gnawing and eating the bankes thereof. Also at one side of the citie it was cleped Terentus, as a man would say, wearing the bankes. It springeth from the Apennine, above Arnus. At the first it is but small and shallow, but before it entred into Rome, it (having received 40 other rivers) is encreased to such bignesse, that ships of burden and the greatest hulkes, may come up in it as farre as Rome. This river divideth Tuscan from Umbria, the Sabines country and the Latines, entred at the North part of the citie, and so passeth through it Southward, betweene the gates Hostienfis and Portuenfis, leaving Ianiculum on the right hand and the citie on the left, and so neere unto Hostia is discharged into one maine broad streame, and falleth into the Tyrrhene sea. Vpon the bankes thereof, as if they were consecrate to some divine power, it was not lawfull to set up any building. Certaine warders and keepers there were appointed, for the channell and the bankes. But of this river, Plinie and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II.

Of the bridges built upon Tybre.

THe Tybre, as is above-said, beeing so deepe as that it is navigable, and beareth the greatest ships, hath no found in any place that can be waded through; and therefore necessarie it was to make bridges over it, and so to joine that part on the farther side of Tybre, to the rest of the citie. Hercules, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridge, where afterwards stood that which they called Sublicius. Also before the foundation of the citie, there was a bridge over Tybre, called Sacer; upon which they sacrificed men to Saturne by throwing them downe into the river. But when Hercules afterward had put downe that manner of sacrificing, he gave order, that mens images made of reeds and bulrushes (which they called Argeos) should be cast downe in stead of them. But after the citie was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Milvius, Aelius, Vaticanus, Ianiculensis, Cestius, Fabricius, Palatinus, and Sublicius. And all these, save the Sublician onely, Tullius overthrow.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Milvius.

THe bridge Milvius, which men now call Molvius, standeth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the citie. Built it was in the troublesome times of Sylla, by Scavrus when hee was Censor. Many a time they say it was cast downe, and as often set up againe.

CHAP.

CHAP. IIII.

The bridge Aelius, now S. Angel, the Vatican or Triumphall, the Ianiculensis or Aurelianus.

THe bridge at this day called S. Angell, in times past Aelius, tooke that name of Aelius Hadrianus, for he built that bridge, and neere unto it a sepulchre, which they call Moles Hadriani. Beneath this there is another which giveth passage into the mount Vaticane and the plain thereof, and thereupon they named it Vaticanus; also Triumphalis, for that over it they went up in triumph to the Capitoll, to give thanks to Iupiter and rejoice. The piles are yet to be scene in Tyber, over against the spittle or hospitall of S. Spirit. The third bare the name Ianiculensis of Ianiculum neere unto it, and Aurelianus of the port-way Aurelia, or the gate so called. Antonius Pius paved it over with marble, and being demolished in the civile wars, was called the broken bridge. Afterwards Pope Xystus the fourth, reedified it, and gave unto it his owne name.

CHAP. V.

The bridges Fabricius and Cestius.

Beneath the bridge Aurelius one furlong, over-against the Theatre of Marcellus, in the very middelt of the channell of Tyber, there appeareth a shelte or Island, this was united to the citie by the bridge Tarpeius, so called first of the rocke Tarpeia neere unto it, afterwards Fabricius, of L. Fabricius, who by that bridge conjoined the citie and Island together. The same at this day is called the bridge of foure heads, taking the name of foure marble images with foure faces apeece, standing at the entrie of the bridge, but that bridge which closeth the said Island with the parts beyond Tyber, was called Esquilinus or Cestius in times past, but now S. Bartholomewes bridge.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Island Tyberina.

OF this Islands beginning, wee have treated before in the description of Mars field, Livie and Dionysius also set downe this storie at large. It resembleth the forme of a bireme gally, & where it is broadest, it is not above a dart shoot over, in length it containeth about two stadia or a quarter of a mile. This was in times past called Lycaonia, and was hallowed to the honour of Aesculapius, whose image from out of Epidaurus was thither brought. Of Aesculapius and his temple, read Plinie.

A temple also of Iupiter standeth in it, dedicated by C. Servilius the Duumvir, which had been vowed by L. Furius sixe yeeres before in the Gaules warre.

In the same Island were sicke folke presented unto Aesculapius (in the field.) And neere unto the temple of the said god, was a lazar-house, for that this god was the inventer and maintainer of Phisicke.

In it also stood the chappell of Faunus, neere to the very river: but scarcely remaine there any tokens thereof. This Faunus (as men say) was reported to have bene the first that consecrated chappels and temples to the gods, and for this cause, all such places consecrated to the gods, were called Fana. By the testimonie of Cornelius Tacitus and Suetonius, the statue of the emperour Iulius stood there.

CHAP. VII.

The Senatours bridge called also Palatine, and that which is named Sublicius.

Beneath the abovenamed Island, as it were a darts cast off, was the seventh bridge, called Senatum pons, of the Senatours: also Palatinus, of the mount Palatine neere adjoining: and at this day named it is the bridge of S. Marie in Egypt, by reason of S. Maries church neere by.

Now followeth the last bridge Sublicius, and which also is counted the most auncient of all others. This was first made of tymber by Ancus Martius, at the very foot of the Aventine mount: framed onely with a floure of planks without any yron spikes and nailes or props to shoare against it, so as in time of warre and trouble it might bee taken in peeces one from another. At the gate Capena, was the temple of Mars the warrior, or Gradivus; and therein the sculpture of Mars. Hard by the same temple was the stone Manalis brought into the citie of Rome in time of a great drought, and presently there arose a shoure of raine; whereupon it was called Manalis. In the way Capena, stood the oratorie or chappell of Dea bona: and neere to it, they say, that Clodius and Papirius were slaine. Neere to the gate Capena, was the altar of Apollo, the sacred grove of Honour; and the temples of Hope and Minerva. Likewise of Tempest, built by Marcellus. Moreover, another of Ridiculum: because Annibal having there encamped, was enforced to depart from thence mocked and scorned. Vpon the way Appia was the bridge Valentinus, built by the Emperour Valens, and thereupon, neere the hill Masica, standeth the towne Sinuesia.

This way had certaine notable sepulchres, namely of Collatinus, the Scipios, the Servilij, Metelli, Tullij, of Ennius, Pompeius, the Horatij, and others. And in that part is to be seene the plaine, whereupon the Horatij fought that famous combat to the utterance. In it also there is a water and well-spring, consecrated to Mercurie. To it upon a time when the people of Rome ran, every man dipped therein his branch of laurell, and therewith besprinkled them that were next, with an invocation to Mercurie; that as many as had this asperion and sprinkling, might be assoiled of their finnes, and of perjurie especially. The grove also of Egeria was without this gate. The way Laurentina fell into Appia: wherein S. Sebastian (by report) suffered; even in the very place where they used to solemnise the feast Terminalia, to the god of Meeres and Bounds Terminus.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of those things that be without the gate Hostiensis, and others in general.

From the gate Hostiensis beginneth the way Hostiensis, which leadeth to Hostia, built by Ancus. This was called in old time, the gate of the three twinnes breechren, or Trigeminorum: and without it, Livie setteth the Bursle or merchants hall, Emporium.

In that part of the citie on the other side of the water, were three gates, Portuensis, Aurelia, and Fontinalis. At Portuensis, beginneth a way of that name, and leadeth to the port towne Ostia: where there was a temple of Portunus, the god of havens: and wherein the feast Portunalia was celebrated to the honour of that god.

From the gate Aurelia, the way also Aurelia taketh beginning; which along the sea coasts of Thufcia, leadeth to Pile. The same was called Trajana of Trajanus who repaired it: wherein were the horse-yards of Galba the Emperour; and there also was his sepulchre.

[At the gate Fontinalis, was the feast Fontinalia celebrated at Rome, namely to the goddesse of Fountaines, as saith Sext. Pompeius.]

TO THE READER.

Or as much as Titus Livius is prolix and full of varietie: and howsoever otherwise willing enough to speake our language, yet most loth to forbear and forget certaine Roman words, vvhether with so long time he hath bene acquainted: also for that now and then hee saith one thing in his English tongue, and in his French and Italian another; vvhether by hee may bee thought either to trip, or to have forgotten himselfe, and the fault imputed to his teacher: In these regards (mee thought) I owed thus much for their sake that converse with English Livie, as to satisfie them in that behalfe. A twofold Index therefore I have digested: the one directing and leading readily to the most material & principall matters contained in the whole bodie of the Historie: the other, expounding those things that may seeme at first straunge to the most: and withall, shewing here and there the reason of the foresaid disagreement, hoping that as use will make them more familiar in those straunge phrases: so deeper and farther conference with him in his primitive Latine (the onely touchstone of his true speech) shall excuse and acquit mee of iust blame, who have endeavoured that he might deliver his mind in English, if not so eloquently by many degrees, yet as truly, as in Latine.

A SECOND INDEX, CONTAINING THE EXPOSITION OF THOSE TEARMES IN LIVIE WHICH ARE NOT YET FAMILIAR IN ENGLISH, AND OF SOME PLACES, OMITTED BEFORE IN THE MAR- GINALL NOTES:

Whereunto the Reader may have recourse, when hee meeteth with any such difficultie in the Historie.

A Aulus, the forename to divers families in Rome.
Adiles, certaine inferiour magistrates in Rome: who were of two sortes; Plēbey, and Centuriles. Plēbey of the Commons onely, two in number; more auncient than the other; chosen by the people alone to second and assist the Tribunes of the Commons as their right hands. This name they tooke of the charge they had of temples, chappels, and oratories; albeit they registred the Sanctions and acts of the people called Plēbisfita, and kept the same in their owne custodie; and were clerkes of the market: also they exhibited the games and plaies called Plēbey. Centuriles, were likewise twaine, elected out of the order and degree of the Panitia: so called, of the Ivorie chaire wherein they were allowed to sit, as officers of greater state. They set forth the great solemnities called Ludi magni, or Romani; were overseers of the buildings throughout the citie as well publicke as private, in manner of the scopuli in Athens; they had regard to the publicke vaults, finks, conveyances, and conduits of the citie waters; looked to the Arsenall; &c. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons; and were charged to see unto the provision of corne and victuals. At the first, none but Panitia might be advaunced to this place: but in proceesse of time, Commonsers also attained therunto. These as well as the Plēbey were Sacrosancti, & unviolable.
Antii, they were, who being citizens of Rome, were by the Centours deprived of giving their voices in their Centurie or Tribe; paid all tribute with cittizens according to the valuation of their goods; and served in the wars of their owne charges: and either because ex pendebant, or, ex non magistrant, it seemeth they tooke that name.

A Agmen quadratum: Agmine quadrato ducere, is taken in a three-fold fence. First, The same that infesto exercitu, infesto agmine, or, infestis signis: which signifieth the ordinarie manner of enemies marching with banners displayed, either to a battaile, or to the siege and assault of a fort: and this manner of phrase addeth a grace onely to the sentence. Secondly, To march or fight in a foure square battaillon, though not alwaies with equall sides & right angles: and the same not charged with the carriages at all. Thirdly, VVhen an armie is spread and displayed at large, enclosing the impediments or baggage in the midst, for safetie and securitie.
Agrarie, were lawes preferred by the Tribunes of the Commons, as well for division of lands (conquered from the enemies) among the Commons; as to restrain the possessions of the Nobles within a certaine limit and compasse.
Ambitus, The inordinate and excessive desire to be in office of state, appearing by indirect and unlawfull meanes; either to their friends and kinsfolkes, or to the people: against which many lawes in Rome were provided; namely, Acilia, Bebia, Emilia, Licinia, and others.
Ancilia: Ancile was a buckler or scutcheon, that (as they say) fell from heaven into the hands of R. Numa in time of a plague; and hee being advertised by Egeria, that it was for the health of the citie, and ought to be kept safe; caused it more to be made unto it, so like, as they could not be knowne from the patterne, which hereby was preserved. The keeping hereof was committed to the twelve Flamines.
Annales, were briefe memorials, Chronicles, or commentaries, containing the names of Consuls every yeere, the date of times, and all memorabilia.

THE SECOND INDEX.

memorable occurrents happening therein. The high priests, called Pontifices maximi, had the charge by their place to gather the same into tables, and to set them up in their houses for to be seene: and hereupon they were called Annales maximi, & Maximis Pontificibus; and not of their greatnesse, as those huge volumes, named Libri Elephantini.

Ap. Appia, a forename appropriate to the House of the Claudij in Rome.

Appia via, A notable street or high-way; begun by Ap. Claudius reaching frō Rome, as far as Capua: and afterwards by Iulius Caesar and Trajan, it was extended to Brindis in Calabria. Of all other it seemeth to be the principall, by the testimonie of Papinius the Poet, who writeth thus of it, Appia cunctarum fertur Regina viarum.

Called it was Triumphalis (as also the gate Capena;) because through it the triumphes ordinarily passed at the said gate.

Ara maxima, The great altar reared by Hercules, and tooke the name of a great heap of stones about it.

Avor infelix, Is commonly taken for a tree that naturally beareth no fruit.

Argiletus imus, Is the base or low part of a street in Rome; in regard of the upper end thereof, called Summus: in like sort as Ianus summus & imus.

Area, is taken for some void place, whereupon nothing groweth, quia aere: as Forum boarium in Rome, Area quæ posita de bove nomen habet, and differeth from Campus, for that it is lesse. Also a plot of ground made levell and cleane for to build upon: as in Suetonius 26. Forum Caesar de manubijs inchoavit, the Area whereof, (id est, the trimming and levelling of the plot) cost H-S. milies, id est, an hundred millions of Sestertij. Last of all, the broad yards before temples, not covered but compassed about with columnes, like a cloister with an altar in the mids, be called Area.

Auspices, were wisards or soothsayers, directed by the bowels & inwards of beasts killed for sacrifice, called also Extispices, & in Greeke iugurani, who prying into them, had especial regard of the liver; whereupon their whole Art and learning was teamed haruspiciis, albeit they observed also the heart, lungs, spleene, and kidneys.

As, or Astis, usually in Livie is taken for a Romane poise, or coine in brasse, the tenth part in value of their silver Denarius. At first it was a pound weight of twelve ounces; but afterwards, the Sextans, id est, the sixth part thereof, was valowed worth the whole: and howsoever otherwise it altered in poise, it went alwaies for 3 farthings or thereabout of our english money.

Augurium, See AUSPICIA.

Aurci Romani, Peeces of gold coine currant in Rome: in round reckoning equivalent to our spur-roiall of 15 sh. For 100 Sestertij made aureum, which amount to 15 sh. 7 d. ob. the 4 part of mina, i. a lib. in silver, and of an ounce of angell gold.

Auspicia: Auspices were properly the observation of the birds, either by their singing and flying in the aire; or by their gesture and manner of feeding in their caves or coupe: whereby their Augurs and Pullarij knew in their learning, the pleasure and will of the gods, whether they favoured their enterprises or no. The birds that gave signe by their voice and singing, they called Osines, quasi ore canentes, as the crow, raven, and owle; and thereof came Augurium, quasi avium garrulus. Those that flew ought by their flight & wings, were named Alites or Præpites, as the buzzard, eagle, crane, grype, swan, and broad-winged fowles, avium præpites. The good signes were called Simistra auspicia, quasi sinistima, quod sinist fieri, whether they came from the left hand or the right. In pullets or chickens kept in cages, they observed whether they came forth willingly to their meat (for to abtaine from it was thought unluckie:) whereas their feeding heartily was a good signe, and called solistimum tripudium, quas terripavium & terrepudium, when some of the meat falleth out of the mouth, & terram parit, i. beateh upon the ground; as it must needs do, when they pecked either corne, or gobbets called offæ.

Balisti, were certaine warrelike engines for to send out and levell mightie stones, to batter & shake citie walls, made with ropes of sinews and womens haire especially twined together: as appeareth by Venus Calva at Rome, unto whom, by occasion that the women of the citie parted with their haire for that purpose, a temple was dedicated. According to the weight of stones or bullets that this engine would carrie, they were called Centenariæ, or Talentariæ balistæ.

Basilicæ, were stately edifices or halles at Rome; at first serving to plead in under covert, wherein they differed from Fora: and also to minister justice, of basileus, which significeth a Judge, as well as a King: but afterwards they used to meete there in consultation; also to negotiate and traffique: and these had not onely benches and barres like law-courts, but shops also for the better sort of wares and merchandise.

Bellona, The goddesse of warre; whose temple stood before the gate Carnementalis, & neer adjoining therunto was a colunne named Bellica: from which the Romanes were wont to launce a dart or javelin towards those parts where where they intended to make war: whereas in former times they sent their heralds to the very confines of their enemies, to performe that ceremonie.

Bigati, were the Romane Denarij, having the stampe of a charriot drawne with two horses, called Bigæ.

Booarches, The chiefe magistrates of the Bœotians.

Caius. The forenames of sundrie families in Rome.

Calends, was among the Romanes, the day of the new Moone, which fell out with them ordinarily the first of every moneth: so named dei Fæstæ, id est, a calando, because the pettie Pontife used then to call the people to the court Calabra, and there to pronounce unto them how many daies wer to the Nones of each moneth, &c.

Candidati, were they that stood in election and sued for dignities of magistracie: during which time, they wore whiter and brighter gowns than ordinarie, that they might be the more easily seene and discerned a farre off among others.

Cataphracti, as well horse as foot, were they that were armed at all peeces with complete harness: and such horsemen were named Defensores.

Catapultæ, were engines of warre to shoot arrows or such like offensive weapons, far off: and by that name was called not onely the instrument it selfe, but the arrow or whatsoever was shot out of it: as Turneb. writeth in his 15 Adversar. cap. 1.

Censores, Magistrates of State in Rome: whose charge was to valew and estimate mens goods, and enroll them accordingly in their severall raunges. Also to demise unto certain Fermoars, called Publicanes, the publicke profits of the cittie for a rent, and to put forth the cittie workes unto them, to be undertaken at a price. Likewise to oversee mens manners, whereby oftentimes they would deprive Senatours of their dignitie, take from gentlemen their horses of service and their rings; displace Commoners out of their owne tribe, disable them for giving voices, and make them Ærarij.

Centuries, were raunges and degrees of men according to their worth, as they were assessed and enrolled by the Censores.

Centuriata comitia, were those assemblies and elections, wherein the people of Rome gave their voices and suffrages, according to their haviour and wealth, by Centuries. And such were at all times most favourable to the nobles.

Circenses ludj (as one would say) Circen-eses. For in the beginning before the great listes and shew-places (called Cirques) were built, the plot of ground wherein were performed the horse-runnings and other matteries, was flanked of the one side with the river, and environed on the other with swordes. Vide Turneb. Adversar. lib. 3. cap. 5.

Cistophorus, A peece of silver coine in Greece and those parts neere adjoining, lesse than Drachma or Denarius: so called of the stamp, representing a man carrying a panier or calker with holy reliques, in Cybeles mysterijs, in Bacchi orgijs, or Cereris imitjs. If it be true, that 7500 of them goe to the Euboicke talent, which containeth 4000 Denarij, it is just our groat sterling: but if Denarius have proportionem sesquiquartam to it, and that 4 Denarij are 5 Cistophores, (as Glarean collecteth out of Budanus) it commeth to our teston of 6 pence.

Cloacina, supposed to be the image of Venus, found by K. T. Arius in the great vault or sinke conveyed under the citie, called Cloaca maxima. And for that it was not knowne what goddesse it resembled, hee gave it the name of that place. Others say, it is written Cluacina, of the old word Cluo (to fight:) for that the Romans and Sabines (readie to strike a battaile) were by meanes of myrtle braunches consecrated unto Venus, pacified and reconciled, in that very place where afterwards the said goddesse was by that name worshipped.

Coemptionalis senex, Paulus Manutius upon the familiar Epistles of Cicero, giveth this attribute to Scaptius in the end of the third booke of Livie, whereas in all editions it is, Coemptialis. Now these Coemptionales senes (saith hee) were those old men, in whose tuition and authoritie, men by their last will and testament left their widowes or daughters; and without whome they might not passe in Dominium virorum per coemptionem, i. be married according to the ceremonie called Coemptio, whereby the husband and wife seemed to buy one another.

Cohort, was ordinarily a band of 500 souldiours; although once or twice in Livie wee read of Quadragesima cohorte.

Comitium, was a publicke place or Hall within the Forum Romanum, where the people used to assemble for audience of justice, pleading of causes, and other occasions: whereupon Comitiales dies, were such daies upon the which they might so assemble and meet together.

Comitia, or Comices, were the solemn assemblies of the people at Rome, summoned by the magistrates lawfully; to choose officers, to enact new lawes or cancell old, by their voices: whereof were three sorts.

Comitiata, instituted by Romulus. Centuriata, by Serv. Tullius. Tributa, brought in by the Tribunes. E e e e e ij of of the people : and the first author thereof was P. Volvo.

Curia and Centuriata, were Auspicata, i. performed with the solemnitie of observing the approbation of the birds, and the Senators.

Tributa, were held by the Commons only, penes quos non erant auspicia, and required neither Auspicia nor authoritatem, i. the allowance of the Patres. And as in Comitiis Centuriatis, the richer and greater men had the vantage ; so in Curia and Tributa, the poorer sort (for their number) went away with the better.

In the Curia comitia, at the first (untill Serv. Tullius his reigne) passed the election of KK. and other magistrates, judgements in capitall matters, and lawes. But in latter times, they served onely for two lawes : i. de imperio, or, de re militarium ; in which the Consull or others (chosen to their magistracie in Centuriatis comitiis) had authoritie of commaund in the armie : the other, de adoptione ; and these lawes were called Curia.

In the Centuriata comitia, from the time of Servius Tullius, passed the elections of Consuls, Decemvirs, Tribunes consular, Censours, Pretours, and such greater magistrates ; and confirmed they were by Curia. Also, judgement of capitall matters, and the lawes named Centuriata. In this, there was one Centuria drawne forth by lot out of all the rest, to give their voices first, and that was called Prærogativa. After which, were called to their suffrages, the Centuries of the first and second Clasis, and they were named Primo-vocata : the rest which followed, were called Inter-vocata.

Tributa, served for the creation of Tribunes, Ædiles of the Commons, and other inferiour magistrates. Also the laws as touching peace, or enfranchising allies, judgements penall and fines, and those ordinances concerning the good of the Commons, called Plebiscita.

Some have thought amisse, that Curia and Tributa comitia, were both one : but Curia were more auncient, and of greater state as beeing Auspicata, and ex autoritate Patrum. Herein onely they agreed together and differed from the Centuriata, that in delivering their voices, the Tribes and Curie were intermingled : whereas the Centuries were sorted and gave their voice according to their degree, age, and abilitie in the Censors book.

Congius, or Chus, A measure among the Romanes containing 6 Sextarii, and every Sextarius about 20 ounces : so that Congius receiveth X. librales mensuras ; as appeareth by the old pourtrait thereof in brasse, with these two characters, X. P. i. ten pound. VVhereby in round reckoning it may go for our wine gallon or somewhat better. And for that great persons were wont at first to give dole unto the common people, of wine or oyle by the Congii ; all other donatives and largesses of that kind, were afterwards called Congia.

Consull, one of the sovereign yeerely magistrates in Rome, succeeding in the place of KK. so named, a Consulendo, either of asking counsell of the people and Senat in State matters, and withall giving his owne advise, and providing for the good of the weale-publicke : or else, of judging, for so Consulere signifieth ; as when we say, boni consulere. And Livie saith, that Prætores, Consules, and Judices, may be taken one for another. Two of them were usually chosen everie yeer, as appeareth by the law of the 12 tables : REGIO IMPERIO DUO SUNTO : TIQUE PRÆAUNDO, IUDICANDO, CONSULENDO, PRÆTORES, IUDICES, CONSULES, APPELLANTOR, &c.

Corona, hath divers significations in Livie. Corona urbem cingere, i. to invest a citie round about with armed men, and to give the assault from all parts at once. Sub corona vendere servos, i. to sell slaves in open market, either having ghirlands on their heads, as the manner was ; or environed about with a guard of souldiours, which also is called Corona militum. Sundrie ghirlands or chaplets there were moreover, called Corona, wherewith souldiours were rewarded by their capitaines, or they honoured by their souldiours ; (besides those that were presented to Generals by their friends and well-willers, or offered to the honour of the gods :) as Obsidionalis or Graminea, which was a wreath of a cuich grasse called Gramen, given to him that delivered an armie from streight sieges, and was by the whole armie bestowed upo that favor. Cinica, made of oke branches, for him that in battell saved the life of his fellow citizen. Muralis, resembled the battlements of walls ; which he received of his captain, that first scaled the walls and mounted over, in the assault of cities. Castrensis, in forme of a palliade or rampier made with pales or strong stakes ; the honour of him who first entered the enemies campe. Navalis or Rosstrata, poutraied with the stemmes or beake-heads of shippes, called Rostra ; his reward that first boured the enemies ship, and gave the first meanes of a navall victorie : These were the principall. For, others there were not so ordinarie, as namely, Exploatoria, garnished and set out with the sunne, moone, and other stars ; bestowed upon them that did speciall service in espial and discoverie of the enemies quarters.

Curie, were parishes in Rome, 30 in number, instituted by Romulus. Certaine halls besides, appointed for assemblies & convocations about church matters and religion : whereof some were old, called simply Vetere ; others new, named Novæ. As for Curia Hostilia, it was the ordinarie auncient place of publicke counsell within Rome.

Curio,

THE SECOND INDEX.

Curio, the priest belonging to ech Curia or parish afore said : and Curio Max. the chiefe superintendent over them all.

D

D. Decius, a forename : for Decius, although it were the gentile name of a house, grew afterwards to bee a forename, as Paulus : and likewise forenames at the first, came to name families, as Posthumus.

D. Decimus, a forename likewise, as of that Brutus surnamed Albinus, who killed Cæsar.

Decemvirs, were magistrates, officers, or fellowships, ten in number.

Decemvirs legibus scribendis, were ten men chosen, to make laws in Rome : who afterwards usurped the sovereigne authoritie, and tyrannized.

Decemviri sacrorum, were certain priests, who had the keeping and perusing of Sibyls bookes of destinies, and therout gave order for sacrifices and expiation of prodigies.

Decemvirs ; ten iudges or ministers of iustice, selected out of the great court or counsell of the hundred Centumvirs, and they were called, Decemviri Scitibus indicandus : assitant they were to the Pretour or L. chiefe iustice.

Dictator, a sovereigne magistrat above all others in Rome, from whence no appeale was granted, meeere absolute and king-like : but that his time of rule was limited within fixe months ordinarily : so named, either because he onely said the word and it was done, or because hee was Dictus. i. nominated onely by one of the Consuls, and not otherwise chosen. usually in some time of great daunger of the state. Hee was called also Pretour Maximus : and namely when he was made for the ceremonie of striking up or driving a naile : also Magister Populi, as Cicero 3. de fin. : Moreover he was sometimes appointed to ordeine and hold solemne feasts, in regard that it had rained stones.

Duumvirs, magistrates two in number, of divers sorts.

Duumvirs capitales, judges to sit upon life and death : from whence it was lawfull to appeale to the people.

Duumviri sacrorum, out of the Patritias, ordeined for dedication of temples, preparing the sacred beds for the gods, called Leſtilonia ; and for the bookes of Sibylla : these afterwards were increased to five, and so to ten. See D E C E M V I R I.

Duumviri Navales, two wardens of the navie, ports, and sea-coasts.

E Epulones, were certaine priests whose office was to prepare and set out the solemne feast for Jupiter called Epulum, and for other gods : Of them were three, called Triumviri Epulones, and after seven, Septemviri Epulones.

F

F Æciales were the Heraults : of whom there was a collidge of 20, the principall of them was Pater patratus, as it were their Deane. And according to Plutarch, hee ought to bee a man that had children of his owne, and his father living : for having the charge of making peace and alliances, it behooved that he should be a person accomplished, & as well to looke before as behind Epuriparato si desolato, to regard what is past and what is to come : the one was signified by his father, the other by his children. Fas signifieth sometimes festus dies. i. holidays : and in that sense Ovid entitleth his bookes Fasti, wherein he setteth downe the ordinarie feasts of every month. Otherwhiles they are put for law-daies, wherein the L. chiefe iustice or Pretour might use these three words, Do, Dico, Addico, which betokē to give leave to the partie for to plead, to minister law and justice betweene plaintiffe and defendant, and to pronounce the sentence and award.

Flamines, certaine priests among the Romanes : they tooke that name of Filamen, a filer of wollen yarne, that they used to weare upon their heads. Three of the there were Patritij, and those were called Majores, namely Dialis, for the service of Jupiter, 2. Martialis, of Mars. 3. Quirinalis, of Romulus deified. Of Commoners were twelve more, called Minores, deputed to inferior charges, and the meanest of them all attended the service of Pomona the goddesse of appuls and such fruits.

Fortuna a great goddesse in Rome, enticuled with many and sundrie surnames.

Fors Fortuna, a goddesse of Rome, whose temple was in Transiberina region, where shee was honored and worshipped of idle persons, such as professed nothing, but lived of their rents only, and namely for that she came unlooked for and undeserved.

Fortis Fortuna. i. strong fortune, so called for her power, especially in battaile. Publica, when she favoured the common wealth. Mascula, good to the male kind, & Muliebris, to the female. Virilis, kind to folke of ripe yeeres. Primigenia, gracious to the first begotten or the eldest. Equestris, either for running to helpe with great speed, or assitant in horset service. Obsequens, pliable and easily intreated to accomplish all their vowes and desires. Parva, for advancing meane and obscure persons to wealth and worship. Stiva, for the kind and reasonable ripening of corn and fruit. Prospera, which was alwaies present and vouchsafed her helping hand. Ma-la, when contrariwise shee was backward and and evermore crossed their designs. Viscata, for that many a one hath bene by her enticements snared and entangled. Redux, induxit, Bene Sperans, Refpiciens, Propria, Virgo, Calva, Conversens, gracis topa invenit, quasi astutus, caeca, Vitrea, &c. See Alexander ab Alexandro. Marlian.

Forum Romanum, or Latium, The great common place at Rome, wherein causes were pleaded, and audience given to publicke Orations. Under the name of Forum were other places also and courts, as also markets, distinguished by their proper adjuncts, as Forum Boarium, Oitorium, &c.

Furca, VWhereof slaves were called Furciferi, was a kind of forke or gibbet which slaves carried upon their shoulders when they were scourged by their maisters, either about the Forum or Cirque: whereupon afterwards they were crucified and executed: howbeit, some thinke they bare it onely for a publicke shame.

G

Gabinus cinctus was a kind of habite and wearing of a gowne after the Gabines fashion, when it was cast over the shoulder so backward, that it seemed to compasse and gird round the whole bodie. In that manner the Consull clad, used solemnly to see open the dores of Ianus temple, before hee went to the warres.

Genius, Genij were supposed to bee plumarii and pararii, brokers (as it were) between men and the gods, or rather interpreters and Salutigeruli, messengers betwene, of a middle nature betwixt the one and the other, Caelius Rhodigin, lib. 2. cap. 3. But according to Empedocles, each one was thought to have his angell from the very day of nativitie, unto whome they used to sacrifice upon their birth day, as to their protector. Also every place had their peculiar Genij, and then were they called Lares, as Rurales, and Pemariis in Livie.

Galli, Priests of Cybele that goulded themselves in a frantike furie, and used in their service to her, for to strike and beat upon tabers and drummes.

H

Halla, Besides the ordinarie signification, signifieth the Centumvirall or Decemvirall jurisdiction in supplie or assistance of the Prætorian, for that they set up a speare to bee scene at the place of judgement. Also it betokeneth port-sale, when they sold either goods or slaves to him that would bid most at such a speare. Moreover, the putting forth of the cities works, called Hydrotribuna, to certain Publicanes or undertakers by the great, at a price, and it was called Subbæstatio.

I

Ianus is a god in Rome, sometime represented Bifrons with two faces, signifying the time passed, and that to come: otherwhiles Quadrifrons, and betokeneth the foure times of the yeere; having in his right hand a character resembling three hundred, in the left another, shewing threecore and five, according to the daies of the yeere. But in the plural number Iani, betoken certaine hals or great four-square buildings, with foure prospectes and crosse thorow fares, whereof were divers in Rome. Ides, Eight daies in every moneth; of an old word Idus, to divide: for that they commonly fall about the middest of the month, namely upon the thirteenth or fifteenth daies, according to Horace, Idus tibi sunt agenda, qui dies menssem Veneris marinas, findit Aprilis.

Interdicted of water and fire, were they who for some crime were banished. VWhich judgement, although it was not by expresse sentence pronounced, yet by giving order, that no man should receive such an one into his house, but denie him fire and water (the two necessarie elements of life) he was condemned (as it were) to a civile death: and this was called Legitimum exilium. But voluntarie exile was, when a man to avoid the painment of a greivous fine, or imprisonment, went out of the way of his owne accord, and left his native countrey.

Iugerum, which commonly I translate Acre, seemeth among the Romanes, to bee in measuring of land the Basis, ground, and foundation of all other measures in that kind; like as, the Ass or Alsis, of weights: of which it borroweth the tearmes in sub-division and multiplication, whereof the least is Semiscrupulum. Now is the Scrupulum in land measure fifteene foot square, according to which, it may soone be gathered, how much Iugerum containeth, considering it hath that name, a duobus actibus junctis: by which reckoning it beareth 28800 foot of ground within the square. But for that, others thinke that Iugerum is as much as uno jugo bovum uno die exarari potest, i. one daies worke of a yoke or teeme of oxen: for want of another fitter word (except I would call it a journell) I have expressed it by our familiar tearme of an acre, which is not much under or over a daies worke in plowing of oxen here in England.

Interregnum, or Interregencie, is properly the time betwene the former king deceased, and the creation of a new: and hee that ruled in the meane space, was called Interrex. VWhich tearme continued afterwards in the free State when there were no kings, in the case of vacancie of head magistrates.

H-S. This Character compounded of two capital I, and the letter S, thus coupled together, is Sestertius, that is to say, a silver coine among the Romanes, consisting of two Asses and an halfe, and thereupon it hath the name Sestertius, as a man would say, Semis tertius, i. two, and halfe the third: and therefore you see the numerall note of two, and S for semis, which is halfe. It is the fourth part of the Romane Denarius, and in value amog us is three halfe pence farthing cue. But Sestertium in the neuter gender, betokeneth as much as mille Sestertius, i. a thousand Sesterties, so that decem Sestertia signifieth tenne thousand Sestertij, and decem Sestertium is as much: for you must in this manner of speech understand millia for the regimen of the Genitive case. But if you adde unto Sestertium the numerall adverb, it sheweth the same Sestertium in the neutre above said, multiplied a hundred times so much as the said numerall beareth. For example, decies Sestertium, is decem Sestertium, a hundred times told, and as much to say as decies centena millia Sestertium, which is a million of Sesterties in the primitive signification: whereby a man may soone reckon how much is millies Sestertium and the rest, either under or over decies. The same is to bee said of Numus and Numum, for it is the same that Sestertius and Sestertium. Moreover, decies, millies, and such like adverbs, whether you put Numum or Sestertium thereto, or no, is all one: so that by this forme of speaking, ejus bona fuerunt vicies, is meant thus, his goods amounted unto two millions of Sestertie peeces. Thus much for Livie and other Historians and writers in prose: for I am not ignorant that Poets for the verse sake confound these two words many times, and put Sestertij for Sestertia, as Georgius Agricola hath well observed.

Iupiter Indiges, Indigetes were these called, aut quia nullius rei indigeant, because they need nothing, or quasi in deis agentes, i. conversing among the gods, having bene sometimes men; or by reason that they might not indigetari, i. bee named; or rather for that they were easie to bee entreated; and last of all, quasi in loco degentes, & ideo propitij, i. the tutelar gods and protectours of this or that place: which I rather incline unto.

Iustitium was the stay of civile jurisdiction and pleas for the time, upon some suddain troubles, as Tumultus Gallicus, &c. VWhich vacation, if wee will bee somewhat bold, may bee called not unfely a Lawsteed, as Solstitium the Sunne-steed.

L

L. Lucius. } The forename of manie Romanes.

Latina, sc. serie, Certaine holy daies Conceptiva, i. appointed by the Priest or magistrate, as occasion required, and not set feasts. The solemnitie was published and held by the Romane Consuls newly created, upon the mount Albanus to Iupiter Latialis: and a sacrifice was there offered which they call Latur, for the health of the Latine people: at which, the manner was to give a dole of flesh called Visceratio to the Latine States.

Lechiffone, is in some sort declared in the fift and two and twentie bookes of T. Livius, and is as much to say, as the solemnne ceremonie of trimming and setting out a bed, not for repose but repast, according to the ancient manner: wherein they laid the images of their gods, reared upon boulders and pillows: the principall whereof was that in the honour of Iupiter at the Epulum Iovis, whereupon Iupiter was laid, Iuno and Minerva sitting of either side by him.

Lectus is usually to be understood in Livie for the bed whereupon they laid themselves at ease when they tooke their refection, and Triclinium is taken for Conclave, i. the parlour where they were wont to sup, because the usuall manner was to set three such beds or pallets together: (whereof the reume had the name) and a table raised somewhat higher from the floore, & placed so, as it served all three pallets, and was open at one side for the servants to come unto it, and either set meat thereupon, or to minister what was called for. Vpon each of these beds there sate or leaned ordinarily three persons: so as nine was the full nuber of guests at the board, according to the rule, NO FEWVER THAN THE GRACES, NOR MORE THAN THE MUSES. For Horace in this verse, Sæpe triclinis lectis videascantæ quaternos, seemeth to glaunce at the niggar-dise of him that would rather want meat than guests, and so set twelve at the table which was but for nine, whereby also they were pent up together tooftight.

Legati, are usually taken for Embassadours sent from one prince or State to another. Also for Lieutenants in an armie, having the charge of a legion under the Generall, and in his absence, the charge and command of all. VWho likewise were sent as Nuntioes or messengers of credence from the Generals in the field, to make true report unto the Senat, of the successe of their affaires. Moreover, they are oftentimes put for deputed-delegates, or commissioners assisstant to the Cos. or L. Generall, in matters of state; having their principall reflections from the Senat, but commision to deale in the particulars after their owne discretion: much like to those that bee called Legati a latore.

Libitina, the goddesse of funerals; and after a sort, the superintendent over sepulchres; supposed to be Venus Epitymbia. In whose temple were all things to be sold necessarie for the interring and burial of the dead. VVherupon they also who were employed to carrie forth and burie corpses, were called Libitinarij as well as Vespillones; in Greeke νεκροφάγαι. It is put for death in Horace when he saith, Non omnis moriar, magna pars mei, Vitabit Libitinam; and in Livie, as well for the ministers as furniture to sepulchres belonging. The chapell to this goddesse stood without the cittie, and a gate there was Libitinensis, at which they carried forth their dead. For at Rome they might not commonly burie or burn a dead corps within the cittie, unless it were upon a special priviledge: & the law of 12 tables provided therefore in these expresse words, IN URE NON SEPELITO NEVE URITO: but in some barren part of their land, each man bestowed the ashes or bodies of their dead. The practise whereof is evident by many examples in histories; and at this day are monuments standing of their tombes reared neere the great cauley Appia, and elsewhere about Rome. The consideration hereof, with some other circumstances of a place in the 3 booke of Livie, gave me occasion haply to translate amisse. There happened to bee a great mortalitie in Rome and the territorie about it, not onely of men but of cattell also; at what time as the Volsians and Æquians were encamped within three miles of Rome, with a purpose to give the assault to the cittie; but they were suddainly stricken with a feare that they durst not approach neere, et Æaque procul visa atque imminentes tumuli avocare mentem eorum, &c. where I have englished imminentes tumuli, tombes and graves neere at hand, in opposition of reستا urbis (Rom. mæ) procul visa; and the rather, because it presently followeth, In deserto agro, inter tabernaculorum atque hominum: where tumuli, may well be put for tombes and monuments; and [imminentes] neere at hand: as Livie and others doe take those words. But if any man would have it meant rather of the 7 hills of Rome commaunding and overlooking those houses aforesaid, I will not be against it, but rather my divitijs opertis shall go with him: and pardon me I hope he will, if either there or elsewhere I have seemed to nod and take a little nap, Namque opere in longo fas est obrepere somnum: meaning that I have taken my selfe in the manner, and not slept untill my neighbour awaked me.

Lictors, in Livie, are ministers or sergeants attending upon the magistrates of Rome; namely, Dictatours, Consuls, Pretours: for those only were called sometime magistrates ad ætatem, as superiour to the rest: so called (as Festus thinketh) quod scæces virgarum ligatos ferant, for that they carried rods tied up in bundels; which rods were of birch, willow, hazell, or the Carpine tree, (a kind of Plane or Maple) and within them stuck an axe, all to signifie whipping & death. These officers made way before those magistrates, and were ministers also of the execution.

Litnus, was the Augurs staffe, much like a bishops crozier, crooked at the end.

M

Magister Equitum, Master or Generall of the horsemen. This was an office or dignitie among the Romanes, incorporate as it were in the Dictatour alone, who ever had the absolute naming and chusing of him: and ordinarily he was subject to him, howsoever Minutius was by strong hand and a violent course of the people, made equall to Q. Fabius his Dictatour. Commaunder hee was under him of the Cavallerie: also his Lieutenant-generall and coadjutour with him in all execution. The same that Tribunus celerum in the time of the KK.

M. Marcus.

M. with the note of A. } The forenames of certain Romanes.

Manipulus, in an armie, was at the first a pettie companie of ten soldiours following one javelin, having a wisp of hearbs or hay fastened to the upper end, as a man would say, an handfull of men: used after, for a small band or squadron of souldiours: and Manipulares were they tearmed, who served in one such Manipulus.

Maia, otherwise called Leucothea or Ino, the daughter of Cadmus. Into her temple, at the time of her solemne feast, might no maid servant enter: and if any did, they were sure to be beaten forth by the dames or wives there assembled; in remembrance of one Antigera, the chamber-maid of Ino, with whom her husband Atamas, as shee thought, was more familiar than shee liked well of.

Megalesia, were plaies or games at Rome, not (as the letter seemeth to import) Magni, which were Romani, but in the honour of Cybele the goddesse, named also Idæa, Magna mater, i. the great mother of the gods.

Multa decem millium æris gravis, &c. was no doubt, a fine of brassen money set upon a mans head, after the weight of so much: every As weighing a lib. of 12 ounces. For before that silver was cast and stamped for coine, As grave plaustris ad ætatem convocabant (as Livie saith) when they paid tribute or subsidy to the citie chamber, as they were assessed.

Mundus Muliebris, the Elegancie of women. Nam quem visum Græci nomine ornamentum appellaverunt, cum nos perfecta absolutaq; elegantia mundum i. the world. Plin. first booke fourth chapter.

Murcia or Murtia, one of the names attributed to Venus, quia præter modum, non moveret sed faceret hominem murcidum. i. nimis desidiolum & inactuosum: contrarie to that other goddesse Agenoria, quæ ad agendum excitaret. And hereupon it is that Murcia is put for the goddesse of sloath and litherneffe.

N

Nova tabula, was an easment proposed in favour of debtors at Rome, whereby the old debt-bookes and obligations were cancelled, or the Nomina dashed out. Among the Athenians this practise was called Sisacbia. i. an easing of burden, or Chneocopia, a cutting off or striking out of debts.

N. Numerius, a forename to some houses of Rome.

Nundina, were the market daies appointed every ninth day at Rome, for the paissants of the cuntry to repaire unto the citie, to sell commodities or to buy their necessities. And hereupon Trinundinū, is the space of 27. daies, comprehending three market daies.

Nones, were daies in the month so called, because they began the ninth day ever before the Ides: honoured by the Romanes both for the birth-day of king Servius, and also for the chusing out of the KK. for otherwise it was not festivall (as Ovid saith) Nonarum tutela Deo caret.

O

Ovales or Ova, were egges set upon the goles in the solemnitie of the horse-running, at the plaies Circenses, to reckon or skore up (as it seemeth by Livie) the races, which were performed with 24 courses, to represent foure and twentie hours of the day. Neither was it for nought, that choise was made of egges, rather than other things: for as eggs are laid by birds (the swiftest of al other living creatures) so they also were to contend and strive to bee most active, &c. or else because Castor and Pollux (those renowned horsemen) came of an egge, as Poets fable.

P

P. Publius, a forname to some Romane families.

Panetolium or Panetolus, was a solemne diet or counsell, wherein all the states of Ætolia assembled to consult of publicke affaires.

Patres, were at Rome an hundred Senators or noblemen, counsaillers of state; chosen in this manner: three out of every one of the 30 Curios, & those make 90; three more out of each tribe, (which then were but three) & one by Romulus himselfe: and as this number made the bodie of the Nobilitie or Senate at the first; so, out of every Curia, he chose ten of the most personable and active young men, to the number of 300, (which he called Celeres) to guard his person. From whence came the order of the knights or gentlemen of Rome; a mean degree betwene the two estates of Nobles and Commons, as it were the seminarie, to replenish the Senate, whē the places were void, and to augment the number of them. These were called Patres Conscripti, Ascripti, and Selesti. And like as the former were named Patres Majorum gentium; so the latter sort, Minorum gentium; alluding to the severall raunges of the gods, who were some of them, Majorum gentium, such as ever were counted in heavē; termed also Selesti: others, Minorum gentium, who had bin men, and were after cannonized gods. The offspring and progenie of the Patres, were Patrii, in opposition evermore of Plebei, i. Commoners.

Porticus, were either the porches and other state-like buildings before temples, as belonging unto them: or else goodly galleries & walking places apart by themselves; under which men retired in the raine, and where they used to walke to coole themselves in summer.

Præda, bootie, pillage, or saccage in the own kind, as it was gotten from the enemy, to wit, slaves, prisoners, beasts, goods, armour, &c. Manubie, the mony raised of such pillage or prey, sold.

Pretour, one of the superior magistrates of Rome. In the citie he ruled as L. chiefe justice: in the province he commanded as L. governour and deputie; and was General in the field as well as the Consull. At first, the name of Consull, Pretour, and Iudges, was all one.

Prærogativa centuriæ, were those centuries in Comitijs Centuriatis, which by lot had the first place in giving their voices: the rest that followed, were called Primo-vocate & Inter-vocate, & delivered their suffrages in their course.

Prætexta toga, a robe embroidered of purple, common to men and women, Ingenuitatis insigne, & ornamentum. Cicero in Verrum. 3. VVhereby it appeareth, that it was allowed but to certain persons; and as P. Manutius writeth, to 6 sorts.

1. The children of the Patrii, until 17 yeres age.
2. All Senators upon festival daies.
3. VVardes at the games or plaies called Comptalitijs.
4. Al magistrates, as well in the citie, as in the colonies or bourrough townes incorporate, called Municipia, and Masters of Constratones.
5. All priests, and among them, the Augurs.
6. They that triūph. And this differed fro the rest rest, being wrought with gold and damask worke.

It seemeth that these differed likewise one from the other, in the manner of the guardings; laid broader or narrower: as also in the rich or deep colour, whereupon they were called Dibapina: or that some of these robes were all one purple, other but parcell. And whereas the gentlemen of Rome are said Purpuram induere, it is to be understood either of angusti-clavus, or else of some lighter colour, as the violet, and not of that rich red purple, which is skarlet. For that robe which was done upon our Saviour Christ, * one of the Evangelistes called aurislu and other two, * angelus.

Pullarius, the Chickmaiter or pullitier; one that had the charge and overseeing of the sacred chickens, kept in a pen or coupe for auspica: who by observing their gesture or feeding betimes every morning, related what was foretold thereby good or bad. See more in AUSPICIA.

Pro-consull. } Some have thought, } Pro consule.
Pro-pretour. } that they should bee } Pro pretore.
Pro-questor. } written otherwise thus, } Pro questore.
but they are in mine opinion out of the way: for in deed Pro-consull is he, who having bin Consull, went out of his magistracie at the yeeres end, and nathlesse was sent forth into his province againe with full Consular authoritie: whereas Proconsule (to speake precisely) is the Viz-consull, namely one that having never bene Consull created, but some private person, yet upon an urgent occasion, might for the while supplie the place of the Consull. The same is to be said of the rest. And hereof you may read in the Oration of Cicero, pro lege Manilia. Howbeit in my translation of Livie, I have sometime used Viz-pretour and Viz-consull, for Pro-pretour and Pro-consull: because that manner of composition frameth wel with our teannes in English. Moreover wee read once in Livie of a Pro-dictatur, in the proportionable signification to the other.

Quadrigati, were the Denarii Romani, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with foure horses, called Quadriga.

Quadrans, a peece of base brasse coine or poise at Rome, the fourth part of As, which is a cue and a c.

Quaestors, were inferior officers in Rome, as treasurers to receive and lay out the citie-monie, whereof there were Urbani, Provinciales, and Caestrenses.

Quaestorium, a plot or quarter in the Romane campe, where the treasurer lodged and other officers of the campe.

Q. Quintus, the forename of sundrie Romanes.

Quindecemviri, the same that Quinqueviri first, and Decemviri sacris faciundis. Their number was fiftene: and albeit they were increased by Sylla Dictator to sixtie, yet they retained still the name of Quindecemviri.

Quintana was a gate in the Romane campe, at which, provision was brought in to serve the market. Read the annotation in the end of English RACITUS.

Quinqueviri Mensarii, were certaine men; five in number, appointed upon occasio to discharge the debts of the commons, so called of Mensa, a table set out in publicke place; upon which they either counted or weighed their money.

Quinqueviri muris reficiendis, were five officers at Rome chosen extraordinarily for repairing of the wals and turrets of the citie.

Quinquatrus or Quinquatria, were certaine feasts and games at Rome in the honor of Minerva. They continued five daies, and began the fift day after the Ides of march. i. the twentieth of March: and these were called Quinquatrus Majores. For others named Minores, fell about the Ides of Iune, & that was the minstrels holiday, as appeareth in the ninth of Livie.

Quintilis, the month of Iuly, before Iulius Caesar time.

Quirinalis, was a festivall day to Quirinus, appointed for them to sacrifice, who had neglected or missed to doe divine service in their parish at the feast Formacalis: and it was called the fooles holiday; for that they were ignorant of the time of the former feast, or knew not their owne Curia.

Quirites, the name appropriate to the citizens of Rome: and so they loved to bee called within the citie: but in the campe, if the Generall gave them that tearme, it was taken for a great disgrace unto souldiours and men of armes.

R

Rorarii, were light armed footmen, resembling our forlorne hope: so called arore. i. Deaw. For like as there falleth commonly a drizzling deaw before a good shoure of raine: so these Rorarii skirmished loosely, before the legionarie souldiours came to the battaile.

Rostri, were three-tined pikes of brasse, set in the nose or beak-head of war-ships to offend the enimie, as appeareth by Vagil, Rostriq; tridentibus: and thereupon by Synecdoche, the stemmes of ships were so called. And for that the publicke pulpit for orations at Rome, was reared and adorned with such, it also was called Rostri.

Rudera, Cum milites religione sacri rudera jacerent. To make sence of this place, I have translated Rudera, peecees of brasse money: for that I cannot see what should be ment by rubbish stone in that place, which was not demolished by Anniball,

THE SECOND INDEX.

Anniball, for any thing that I can find; but onely robbed of the silver and gold within the chappel of Fratria: in stead whereof were found avis aceris: by reason that the souldiours, who had some sence of religion and touch of conscience (whereof their leader Anniball had never any) cast from them [Rudera]. Now, probable it is that Rudera, is corruptly put for ara, the latter end of the word: or if we admit Rudera: it is well knowne that Rudus as well as as signified brasse and brasse money, as appeareth by Rudusculum the diminutive: for as of as came Aesculum, so of Rudus (no doubt) Rudusculum: and like as of Aesculum, Aesculanus, a god of the Painins, father of Argentinus (because copper and brasse money was before silver coine:) so, of Rudusculum, the gate Rudusculana in Rome, set out with brasse. Now that Rudusculum is put for a small peece of brasse coine, it is proved by the forme of words in buying and selling, and in manumission (Rudusculum libram ferro): which is all one with are Libram percutio or feri. By which I collect, that Rudera in this place may stand for ara, i. peecees of coin. For there went afore, avis aceris, which Horace putteth for heaps of brasse money, and not for brasse images. And well it may be, that the souldiours upon some devotion, threw into the church their oblations of such money as they had in their belts or bandoliers. This conjecture & construction of mine may serve, untill somewhat here may be made of rubbish stone, or better exposition come in place. The word (I am sure) will bear it, and the context in al sence and congruitie, doth require it.

S

Salutare Deos After a devout & reverent manner they bowed unto the Idols or gods of the heathen as they passed by, & withall, touched their hands: which Lucretius sheweth in these verses,

— Tum portas propter, aliena
Signa manus dexteras ostendunt attenuari
Sape salutantum, sacru proterque meantum.

Sceleratus Vicus, a street in Rome named before time Cyprius, which in the Sabine language significth (good): but upon occasion of a wicked act committed therein, it was by the contrarie, called Sceleratus.

Secession, was a generall insurrection and revolt of the commons in Rome, wherein they left the citie, untill such time as they had the authority of their Tribuns strengthened & confirmed: yea and certaine lawes enacted and established by a solemne oth, with a curse denounced to all them that went about to abrogate or abolish the same: which thereupon were called Sacrata leges.

Serg. } Sergius.
Serv. } Servius. } All forenames to Romans

Sextilis, the month of August, so called by the Romanes before Augustus Caesar his daies, for that it was the sixt in number: as Quintilis the fift, beginning at March.

Subura, 97 a. In Inventum grassantem in Subura. It might well be that yonkers there made a fray or committed some riot and felonie: for it was a street most of all others frequented; and besides, in it kept strumpets and courtisanes, like enough to give occasion of much quarrell and misrule among youth, as appeareth by Juvenal and Martial in this Distichon.

Eame non nimium bone puella;
Quales in media sedent Subura.
Suffragers, were the voices of the people given by Ceturies, Curie, or tribes, which in Rome wet affirmatively under this forme, Uti rogar, i. be it according to your bill: and negatively thus, Antiquo, i. I denie or reject it.

Sordidati, were they that chaunged their weed in ratu, i. (whiles either themselves or their friends were in trouble and daunger of judgement) that is to say, put off white, which was the ordinarie colour, and did on blacke: but if they chaunged their apparell upon sorrow and mourning for the losse of friends or any publicke calamitie, they were called rather Phyllati and Atati.

Sella Curulis, a seat or chaire of estate. One of the regall ornaments at Rome, belonging to the kings first: afterwards, during the free state, used by Dictators, Consuls, Pro-consuls, Pretours, and Propretours, Censours and Aediles, namely those called Curules, for distinction from those that were Plebeij: and last of all, by the emperours in the time of the monarchie. This chaire was made of Ivorie: on which the abovesaid magistrats usually sat, not onely in the Senat-house when they consulted or gave audience; or when they beheld the publicke games and plaies, and rode either in triumph, or otherwise in the streets, mounted upon their Chariotes: but also at home within their private houses; and wheresoever else it pleased them. And this badge or ensigne of honor they had both in time of their magistracie, & afterwards. And as such Senatours were called Curules (for the rest, who had not attained to those dignities, they named Pedanes, as some thinke, for that they went on foot to the Senat or places before mentioned) so those magistrats likewise abovesaid, were entituled by the name of Curule. And Curulis was that chair called either of Curvus a chariot, for that they sat thereupon within their chariots; or, quasi Curva, because it was made crooked or curb-wise, like unto our folding chaires.

Senatona, A Counsaillour of state. A name it was of honour; and not of age, as the word implieth: for to that place me attained often times very young. Senat was the bodie of that degree and and common Counsell, opposite unto Plebs at Rome, namely when it was biceps, and the whole people comprehended under Senatus and Plebeis.

Sextans, a small brassen peece of money at Rome, which being the first part of As, cometh to a cue or halfe a farthing.

Sextarius was the Basis of measures in Rome, as As of weights: and looke how As was divided into twelve ounces, so Sextarius into twelve cyathi, and in measures Sextans was the sixth part of Sextarius, which weighed twentie ounces, much about awine pint and a halfe a mugus.

Of Sibylls bookes so often mentioned in Livie, which being three in number, were bought of Sibylla by king Tarquinius the proud, at the price of nine, after he had burned sixe of them before his face: which bookes were kept diligently in the Capitoll: and wherout the Decemvirs by their learning made report of the will and pleasure of the gods, See A. Gellius. 1. booke 19 chapter.

Signum, was the generall name of all the ensignes in the field. But Aquila more particularly was the maine standerd to a whole legion: so called, for that upon the top of a speare was reared and fastned an Eagle in silver at full reliefe, and the same sometime was gylded standing upon a base or footstall of the same metall. The other ensignes, as well of cohorts, which were bands of five hundred men usually, as of centuries, i. companies of hundreds, named more especially Vexilla, & were generally called Signa, had the portaiture of Minotaires, wolves, bores, horses, dragons, with sundrie other devises according to the fancie of the Colonels or capitaines, containing also the name of the cohort or Centurie, and the legion to which they belonged.

Talentum Atticum, As well ponderale, which was weighed, as nummale or nummum, which was counted in mony, was of two sorts: The lesse, of sixtie pound Atticke, and every one of them consisted of a hundred Drachme or Denarii Romani. If Mina then, bee three pound two shillings sixe pence, sterling, the lesse talent Atticke amounted to 187 pound tenne shillings of our English monie. The greater, or simply the great, talent, in Livie, is fourescore mina, and hath proportionem Atticam or Siquiteriam, ad minus, which cometh to two hundred and fiftie pound sterling. Now was the Euboicke talent (a heere of Livie also speaketh) halfe of Talentum majus Atticum.

T. Tius, A forename to many houses of the Romanes.

T. Tisula, A targuet-fence, which the Legions

Rom. soldiors, made either in the open field when they were overcharged with their enemies, or in approaching the walls of townes to give assault. In the former, after they had enclosed within them their baggage and light armed men, they rested themselves upon their knees, with their targuets close couched together over their heads, to avoid the enemies shot: and after they had well breathed they would rise up all at once againe, fresh and lustie to a new skirmish. In the latter, they had the like targuet-rouse, but pent-house wise, one overlapped the other after the manner of tiles, and so they skaled walls without offence from above.

Templum hath in Livie three significations, 1. A sacred house or chappell dedicated to some god or goddesse for divine service, as the temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll, &c. 2. An open place, from whence a man might see all about him, as having nothing to hinder his prospect, and which likewise might bee seene from all parts, wherof cometh the verbe Contemplari, i. to behold. And such did the Augures chuse for to take their signes of bird-flight. 3. Any place hallowed, although not for divine service, yet for debating of serious humane affaires, as their Curie and Counsell-chambers, yea, and the Rostra at Rome.

Thalassio, An Auspicate or luckie word used at Bridales or weddings in Rome, like to this among the Greekes. Thalassio is Thalassio Hymen & Hymenae, hymen Exc. Catull.

T. Tense, wherof Livie writeth in the fifth & ninth books, were certain pettie chariots or dreyes of silver or yvorie, carrying the images and ornaments of their gods in great pompe upon certaine high daies: and they who led the horses drawing the same, wore their richest apparrell, holding in their hands and training the same reins stretched out at length in solemne wise, wherupon Festus thinketh they tooke the name T. Tense quasi Tense.

Trabea was a roiall robe or mantle of estate, all of deepe purple or skarlet onely, at the first: but afterwards, embroidered richly with gold. Livie seemeth to confound it with Vestis purpurea, Picta, Balata, and Triumphalis. And in truth, all one they were in the principall substance and matter thereof, namely, purple or skarlet; but differens in the setting out, being embroidered with gold, more or lesse, distinguished also with white among (for that was a roiall colour) as may appeare by the glademe, which was a white wreath, or had done about the head of kings, or in the manner of the worke for either it was pallata, so called a ludum clavum, i. of the broad buttons of gold, ad in st. palmam, i. to the breadth of ones hand, as Festus thinketh: or branched and damasked with flowers, yea, like to the date tree: or else picta, i. of the same embroidered

Tribunes,

THE SECOND INDEX.

Tribunes of the Commons were certaine magistrates, as Provosts or protectors of the Commons, to restrain & keepe downe the excessive power of the nobilitie; chosen and confirmed by the generall oath of the people, whereby they were Sacrosancti, i. sacred or inviolable, and no violence might be done to their person. They had a negative voice and power of inhibition, called Intercessio, whereby they might crosse & stop the proceedings of the Senate, or any magistrate, save only the Dictator: even the very Consuls, whome in some case they might command.

Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie, or Consularie, governed the state of Rome many yeeres in steed of Consuls.

Tribunes militarie in the armie, were Colonels over a thousand.

Tribuni auri, were the keepers of the cittie chamber or common Treasure, as it were, the maisters of the exchequer.

Tribes in Rome, first three, containing each of them tenne Curie: but afterwards they were five and thirtie, containing all the naturall citizens of Rome.

Tribu moveri, was a kind of ignominie and disgrace, when a man was displaced by the Censors out of his owne tribe into another more base than it, and namely crustica in urbanam, of which urbane there were foure: Suburana, Esquilina, Palatina, and Collina: into which king Servius distributed those that were manumitted; and Quintus afterwards, sextensem tribum.

Triumviri capitales, Three Iudges delegate to sit upo life & death, touching felonious crimes. They were called also Quaestores parricidii, &c.

Triumviri Aeneales, Three officers for the mint of money, either brasse, silver, or gold. They are represented in old coines, by these five letters stamped thereupon, A. A. A. F. F. for are, auro, argento, flando, feriundo: that is to say, for the melting, coining, and stamping of brasse, silver, and gold. They were afterwards foure in number, and named Quatuorviri.

Triumviri or Tresviri nocturni, Three overseers of the night-watch, for fire, &c.

Triumviri Mensarii, Three Commissioners deputed for the time, and as occasion required, in steed of bankers or treasurers to receive a stock of mony, & to lay the same out upon extraordinary charges, as in the time of the second Punicke war, when the cittie chamber was without mony. VVhich stocke was put into their hands out of private mens purses, by way of a voluntarie benevolence and contribution, as appeareth in the sixe and twentieth booke of Livie.

Triumviri (Extraordinarii) Three likewise to levie souldiours and able men for to beare armes (without the usual order of musters) throughout Italie, upon some speciall occasion.

Triumviri coloniis deducendis, three commissioners who had authoritie to enroll new inhabitants into any colonie: also to set out and divide the cittie lands gotten by conquest, at their discretion among them.

Triumviri also there were three, VVardens to oversee the sacrifices, the oblations & offerings to the gods.

Taurilia, certaine feativall games instituted (as Festus saith) by king Tarquinius the proud, for to pacifie the infernall gods; upon occasion of a contagious maladie that hapned to women great with child, endangering both them and those they went with: which arose upon the corrupt flesh sold abroad in the market of oxen and bulls, killed for sacrifices: wherupon the mony employed about those solemnities, was called Tauricum as.

Solitanilia or Stovetantilia, was a solemne sacrifice at the lustration, review, or purging of the cittie every fifth yeere; & this was called Lustrum conditum. It was performed by killing a bull, a ram, and a bore. At which solemnitie all that were able to beare armes, assembled in order of battaile.

Triumph, a solemnitie in honor of them who have vanquished their enemies: so called, for that their souldiours rejoynded, totriumph; (as Varro thinketh) or of Triumphus for Triumphus: one of Bacchus names, the first inventer thereof: or of Triumphus, three voices: because it was grunted by the suffrages of souldiours, Senators, and common people: as it may appeare in Livie, by the triumph of L. Paulus Aemilius, who had like to have bene disappointed thereof, by his owne souldiours.

V

Venus Erycina, Ovid. A. Fast. a sculo nomina colle tenet: shee was so called of a promontorie in Sicilie, called Eryx, where there was a goodly temple built in the honour of Venus; and afterwards at Rome also in memoriall thereof.

Versus Escemini, certaine licentious and unchaste songs, used among the Painims at weddings: the manner whereof, came first from the cittie Fescenninum (as some thinke:) or as others, Quia fescennium putabatur arere, because they were thought to have vertue to withstand witchcraft and forcerie.

Vestales virginis, were certain professed Nuns vowing virginity, who had the keeping of the sacred fire of Vesta. Nec tu aliud vestiam, quam pyram intellige flammam, Ovid. This Vesta was broght from Troie with the image of Minerva, called Palladium, and other holy reliques.

Vltro tributa, Horat. were certaine cittie workes, for which the Censors did bargain with the Publicans or undertakers, at a price.

Verbena, although it signifieth a speciall herb, called called Verbena, verve in english, & in Greek θερβανη, because doves delight much to bee about it: yet the word is attributed to divers other herbes put to holy use among the Pagans, which are called Sagina in Latine, and in Greeke ιερβανη. But Diocorides describeth one sort thereof which runneth by the ground, and groweth not so high as our vervein doth, and it seemeth to be that which the Physicians, Herbarists, and Apothecaries call Gramen, γρην in Greeke, dent de chien in French, and the coich grasse in English: according to which faith Lyrie, Facialis ex arce puram graminis herbam attulit.

Victorialis, quinaris numus, A peece of Romane silver coine, halfe Denarius, and a double Sesterterius, having the image of Victorie stamped upon it, either standing on foote crowned with a chaplet of bay, or els carried in a triumphall charriot drawne with foure steeds, holding forth in her right hand the foresaid guirland, as is to bee seene in diverse antiquities of coine.

Veteres significeth a place in Rome called Vetere: Curia in respect of Nova, or certain shops called Argentaria of bankers, in regard of others also, named Nova.

A Table of all the Orations in Titus Livius, by way of division of the generall into particular members, fitted for all sorts of speaking or writing, and digested according to the severall places of the three principall heads of all Causes in Oratorie, to wit, the Deliberative, the Demonstrative, and the Judiciall.
